3. That all undue honouring of worldly greatness and riches should especially be watched against in Christian societies. St. James does not here encourage rudeness or disorder; civil respect must be paid, and some difference may be allowed in our carriage towards persons of different ranks, but this respect must never be such as to influence the proceedings of Christian societies, in disposing of the offices of the church, or in passing the censures of the church, or in anything that is purely a matter of religion; here we are to know no man after the flesh. It is the character of a citizen of Zion, that in "his eyes a vile person is contemned, but he honoureth them that fear the Lord." If a poor man be a good man we must not value him a whit the less for his poverty; and if a rich man be an ill man, though he may have both gay clothing and a gay profession, we must not value him any whit the more for his riches.

4. Of what importance it is to take care what rule we go by in judging of men. If we allow ourselves commonly to judge by outward appearance, this will too much influence our spirits and our conduct in religious assemblies. There is many a man whose wickedness renders him vile and despicable, that yet makes a figure in the world. And, on the other hand, there is many a humble, heavenly, good Christian that is clothed meanly, but neither should he nor his Christianity be thought the worse of on this account.

Thirdly. We have the greatness of this sin set forth, ver. 4, 5. It is great partiality, it is injustice, and it is to set ourselves against God, who has chosen the poor, and will honour and advance them, if good, let who will despise them.

1. In this sin there is shameful partiality. "Are ye not then partial in yourselves?" The question is here put, as what could not fail of being answered by every man's conscience that would put it seriously to himself. According to the strict rendering of the original, the question is, Have ye not made a difference? And, in that difference, do not you not judge by a false rule, and go upon false measures? And does not the charge of a partiality, condemned by the law, lie fully against you? Does not your own conscience tell you that you are guilty? Appeals to conscience are of great advantage when we have to do with such as make a profession, even though they may be fallen into a very corrupt state.

2. This respect of persons is owing to the evil and injustice of the thoughts. As the temper, carriage, and proceedings are partial, so the heart and thoughts, from whence all flow, are evil. "Ye are become judges of evil thoughts;" ye are judges according to those unjust estimations and corrupt opinions which you have formed to yourselves. Trace your partiality till you come to those hidden thoughts which accompany and support it, and you will find those to be exceeding evil. You secretly prefer outward pomp before inward grace, and the things that are seen before those which are not seen. The deformity of sin is never truly and fully discerned till the evil of our thoughts be disclosed. And it is this which highly aggravates the faults of our tempers and lives, that the imagination of the thoughts of the heart is evil, Gen. vi. 5.

3. This respect of persons is a heinous sin, because it is to shew ourselves most directly contrary to God; ver. 5, "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world rich in faith?" &c., "but ye have despised" them, ver. 6. God has made them heirs of a kingdom that you make of no reputation, and has given them very great and glorious promises to whom you can hardly give a good word, or a respectful look. And is not this a monstrous iniquity in you that pretend to be the children of God, and conformed to him? "Hearken, my beloved brethren;" by all the love I have for you, and all the regards you have to me, I beg you would consider these things. Take notice of it, that many of the poor of this world are the chosen of God. Their being God's chosen doth not prevent their being poor; their being poor doth not at all prejudice the evidences of their being chosen; Mat. xi. 5, the poor are evangelized. God designed to recommend his holy religion to men's esteem and affection, not by the external advantages of gaiety and pomp, but by its intrinsic worth and excellency, and therefore chose the poor of this world. Again take notice, that many poor in the world yet are "rich in faith;" thus the poorest may become rich, and this is what they ought to be especially ambitious of. It is expected from those who have wealth and estates that they be rich in good works, because the more they have the more they have to do good with; but it is expected from the poor in the world that they be "rich in faith," for the less they have here the more they may and should live in the believing expectation of better things in a better world. Take notice farther, that believing Christians are rich in title, and in being heirs of a kingdom, though they may be very poor as to present possessions; what is laid out upon them is but little, what is laid up for them is unspeakably rich and great. Note again, that where any are rich in faith there will be also Divine love. Faith working by love will be it, all the heirs of glory. Note once more under this head, that heaven is a kingdom, and a kingdom promised to them that love God. We read of the crown promised to them that love God, in the former chapter, ver. 12; we here find there is a kingdom too; and, as the crown is a crown of life, so the kingdom is an everlasting kingdom. All these things laid together shew how highly the poor in this world, if rich in faith, are now honoured, and shall hereafter be advanced, by God, and consequently how very ill a thing it was for them to despise the poor. After such considerations as these the charge is cutting indeed, "But ye have despised the poor," ver. 6.

4. Respecting persons, in the sense of this place, on account of their riches or outward figure, is shewn to be a very great sin, because of the mischiefs which are owing to worldly wealth and greatness, and the folly which there is in Christians paying undue regards to those who had so little regard either to their God or them. "Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment-seats? Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which ye are called?" ver. 6, 7. Consider how commonly riches are the incentives of vice and mischief, of blasphemy and persecution; consider how many calamities you yourselves sustain, and how great reproaches are thrown upon your religion, and your God, by men of wealth, and power, and worldly greatness; and this will make your sin appear exceeding sinful and foolish, in setting up that which tends to pull you down, and to destroy all that you are building up, and to dishonour "that worthy name by which you are called." The name of Christ is a "worthy name," and reflects an honour, and gives worth to them that wear it.

8 If ye fulfil the royal law according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well: 9 But if ye have respect to persons, ye com-and was gradually dropped as the enmity between the Jews and Christianity increased, and the word "ecclesia" superseded it. "Synagogue" implies merely an assembly, but "ecclesia" a people united by laws and bonds even when not assembled. Thus the Church of Christ is properly denoted by the latter term, as being a society knit together by the closest spiritual bonds, and altogether independent of space. (See Trench, "New Testament Synonyms," and Vitranga.)

ii. 4. "Did you not doubt within yourselves, and become judges of evil thoughts?" (Alford): i.e., "Did ye not practically doubt the teaching of your faith, which would make you regard the poor as equal to the rich brother, or even more than his equal, if he had more of Christ's spirit?"

ii. 6, 7. "Rich men:" not, of course, brethren here. Further proof that rich men, as such, do not demand more respect than poor, for they may persecute.

ii. 8—11. The sense is thus summed up by Alford: "All this mit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors. 10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. 11 For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law. 12 So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty. 13 For he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy; and mercy rejoiceth against judgment.

The apostle having condemned the sin of those who had an undue respect of persons, and having urged what was sufficient to convict them of the greatness of this evil, he now proceeds to shew how the matter may be mended. It is the work of a gospel ministry not only to reprove and warn, but to teach and direct; Col. i. 28, "Warning every man, and teaching every man." And here,

First, We have the law that is to guide us, in all our regards to men, set down in general; ver. 8, "If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well." Let any should think St. James had been pleading for the poor, so as to throw contempt on the rich, he now lets them know that he did not design to encourage an ill carriage toward any. They must not hate, or be rude to, the rich, any more than despise the poor; but, as the Scripture teacheth us to love all our neighbours, be they rich or poor, as ourselves, so in our having a steady regard to this rule we shall do well. Observe from hence,

1. That the rule for Christians to walk by is settled in the Scriptures. If "according to the Scriptures," &c. It is not great men, nor worldly wealth, nor corrupt practices among professors themselves, that must guide us, but the Scriptures of truth.

2. The Scripture gives us this as a law, to love our neighbour as ourselves. It is what still remains in full force; and is rather carried higher and farther by Christ than made less important to us.

3. This law is a "royal law." It comes from the King of kings. [It is the law of him whom God hath set as King in his holy hill of Zion,—it is the law of our King,—it is the law of laws, on which "all the law and the prophets do hang."] Its own worth and dignity deserve that it should be thus honoured. And the state in which all Christians now are, as it is a state of liberty, and not of bondage or oppression, makes this law, by which they are to regulate all their actions to one another, a royal law.

4. That a pretence of observing this royal law, when it is interpreted with partiality, will not excuse men in any unjust proceedings. It is implied here, that some were ready to flatter rich men, and be partial to them, because if they were in the like circumstances they should expect such regards to themselves; or they might plead, that to shew a distinguished respect to those whom God in his providence had distinguished by their rank and degree in the world, this was but doing right; therefore the apostle allows that, so far as they were concerned to observe the duties of the second table, they did well in giving honour to whom honour was due, &c. But this fair pretence would not cover their sin in that undue respect of persons which they stood chargeable with. For,

Secondly, This general law is to be considered together with a particular law; ver. 9, "If ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors." Notwithstanding the law of laws, to love your neighbour as yourselves, and to shew that respect to them you would be apt to look for yourselves if in their circumstances, yet this will not excuse your distributing either the favours or censures of the church, according to men's outward condition. But here you must look to a particular law, which God, who gave the other, has given you together with it; and by this you will stand fully convicted of the sin I have charged you with. This law is in Lev. xix. 15, "Thou shalt do no unrighteousness in judgment; thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour." Yea, the very royal law itself, rightly explained, would serve to convict them; because it teaches them to put themselves as much in the places of the poor as in those of the rich; and so to carry it equitably toward one as well as the other. Hence he proceeds,

Thirdly, To shew the extent of the law, and how far obedience must be paid to it. They must fulfil the royal law, have a regard to one part as well as another; otherwise it would not stand them in stead, when they pretended to urge it as a reason for any particular actions; ver. 10, "For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, is guilty of all." This may be considered,

1. With reference to the case St. James has been upon. Do you plead for your respect to the rich because you are to "love your neighbour as yourselves?" Why then, shew also an equitable and due regard to the poor, because you are to love your neighbour as yourself; or else your offending in one point will spoil your pretence of observing that law at all. "Whosoever shall keep the whole law," if he offend "in one point" wilfully, allowedly, and with continuance, and so as to think he shall be excused in some matters because of his obedience in others, he is guilty of all. That is, he incurs the same penalty, and is liable to the same punishment by the sentence of the law, as if he had broken it in other points, as well as that he stands chargeable with; not that all sins are equal, but that all carry the same contempt of the authority of the lawgiver, and so bind over to such punishment as is threatened on the breach of that law. This shews us what a vanity it is to think that our good deeds will atone for our bad deeds, and plainly puts us upon looking for some other atonement.

2. This is further illustrated by putting a case different from that before mentioned; ver. 11, "For he that said, Do not commit adultery, said also, Do not kill. Now, if thou commit no adultery, yet, if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law." One perhaps is very severe in the case of adultery, or what tends to such pollutions of the flesh, but less ready to condemn murder, or what tends to ruin the health, break the hearts, and destroy the lives of others. Another has a prodigious dread of murder, but has more easy thoughts of adultery. Whereas one that looks at the authority of the lawgiver more than the matter of the command will see the same reason for condemning the one as the other. Obedience is then acceptable when all is done with an eye to the will of God; and disobedience is to be condemned, in whatever instance it be, as it is a contempt of the authority of God. And for that reason, if we offend in one point, we condemn the authority of him that gave the whole law, and so far are guilty of all. Thus, if you look to the law of old, you stand condemned; for, "cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them," Gal. iii. 10.

Fourthly, St. James directs Christians to govern and conduct themselves more especially by the law of Christ; ver. 12, "So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty." This will teach us not only to be just and impartial, but very compassionate and merciful, to the poor; and it will set us perfectly free from all sordid and undue regards to the rich. Observe here,

1. The Gospel is called a law. It has all the requisites of a law; precepts, with rewards and punishments annexed. It prescribes duty, as well as administers comfort. And Christ is a king to rule us, as well as a prophet to teach us, and a priest to sacrifice and intercede for us. [Yet it is not, as some vainly teach, a new and less strict law adapted to the weakness of fallen man. While all who believe the Gospel are for ever freed from the law as a covenant, they are still bound by it as a rule of life, and are brought under higher obligations, and under the influence of mightier motives drawn from the cross of Jesus, to keep it perfectly.] As Paul and James wrote under the guidance of the same Spirit, we know that there can be no real opposition between them. But how is the seeming contrariety between them to be explained? Paul declares that the Gospel establishes the law; the faith of which he speaks "works by love." It is not a bare intellectual assent to abstract truths, but a principle of action giving colour to the whole inward and outward life of the believer. In all the epistles he unfolds and enforces the doctrine of justification by faith, he exhorts Christians to the performance of the very duties on which James insists. On this head they are as one. Both teach that without holiness no man can see the Lord. When Paul says "a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law," he excludes all works, "not by deeds of law." But the faith of which James speaks when he says, "A man may say, I have faith, you have works," is not the faith of Paul. James shews that Abraham had no such faith wholly separate from works, but one which prompted him to holy action. The faith against which James argues is an inactive, dead faith. This is widely different from the faith of Paul, which he describes as "faith with the heart." James does not say that Abraham was justified by works only, but that his "faith wrought with (συνεργησεν) his works;" it resulted in, or completed itself in, works. Paul had respect to those who maintained that men are justified before God by their own works. James has reference to those who made a bare profession of the Gospel all-sufficient. Against them he teaches that real faith is ever productive of all holy obedience. We are under the law to Christ.

2. It is a "law of liberty." A law that we have no reason to complain of as a yoke or burthen; for the service of God according to the Gospel is perfect freedom. It sets us at liberty from all slavish regards either to the persons or things of this world.

3. We must all be judged by this law of liberty. Men's eternal condition will be determined according to the Gospel. This is the book that will be opened when we shall stand before the judgment-seat. There will be no relief to those whom the Gospel condemns; nor will any accusation lie against those whom the Gospel justifies.

4. It concerns us therefore so to speak and act now as becomes those that must shortly be judged by this law of liberty; that is, that we come up to gospel terms, that we make conscience of gospel duties, that we be of a gospel temper, and that our conversation be a gospel conversation, because by this rule we must be judged.

5. The consideration of our being judged by the Gospel should engage us more especially to be merciful in our regards to the poor; ver. 13, "For he shall have judgment without mercy that hath shewed no mercy; and mercy rejoiceth against judgment." Take notice here, that the doom which will be passed upon impenitent sinners at last will be "judgment without mercy." There will be no mixtures or allays in the cup of wrath and of trembling, the dregs of which they must drink. Take notice, again, that such as shew no mercy now shall find no mercy in the great day. But we may note, on the other hand, that there will be such as shall become instances of the triumph of mercy, in whom mercy rejoices against judgment. All the children of men, in the last day, will be either vessels of wrath or vessels of mercy. It concerns all to consider amongst which they shall be found. And let us remember that "blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy."

14 What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works? can faith save him? 15 If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, 16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit? 17 Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone. 18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works. 19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble. 20 But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? 21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? 22 Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? 23 And the scripture was fulfilled which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the Friend of God. 24 Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, is true of the rich; still I do not say hate them, drive them from your assemblies, &c. If you observe the great command, "Love others as yourselves," in your conduct to all, well and good: but respect of persons, instead of being a keeping, is a breach of this law."

ii. 14. We must bear in mind that those whom the apostle is addressing had once relied for salvation on their descent from Abraham; now it would appear that they trusted in a mere theological faith—a belief in the historical truths respecting God and Christ; and this faith—very different from faith such as St. Paul speaks of (Rom. iii. 22)—he declares to be profitless, having no results—an impossibility with faith in the highest sense.

ii. 19. This profitless belief in and assent to the truth of certain truths is possessed by the evil spirits, but is neither useful nor consolatory to them; on the other hand, Abraham and Rahab had faith which compelled them to act, and so was proved to be valuable faith—living, not dead.

and not by faith only. 25 Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way? 26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

In this latter part of the chapter the apostle shews the error of those who rested in a bare profession of the Christian faith, as if that would save them, while the temper of their minds, and the tenor of their lives, were altogether disagreeable to that holy religion they professed. To let them see, therefore, what a wretched foundation they built their hopes upon, it is here proved at large that a man is justified not by faith only, but by works. Now upon this arises a very great question, namely, how to reconcile St. Paul and St. James? St. Paul, in his epistles to the Romans and Galatians, seems to assert the direct contrary thing to what St. James here lays down; saying it often, and with a great deal of emphasis, that we are justified by faith only, and not by the works of the law. Amice scripturarum lites, utinam et nostra.—“There is a very happy agreement betwixt one part of Scripture and another, notwithstanding seeming differences; it were well if the differences among Christians were as easily reconciled.” Nothing (says Mr. Baxter) but men’s misunderstanding the plain drift and sense of Paul’s epistles, could make so many take it for a matter of great difficulty to reconcile Paul and James. A general view of those things which are insisted on by the Antinomians may be seen in Mr. Baxter’s paraphrase. And many ways might be mentioned which have been invented amongst learned men to make the two apostles agree. But it may be sufficient only to observe these few things following:—

1. When St. Paul says, that “a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law,” Rom. iii. 28, he plainly speaks of another sort of works than St. James does, but not of another sort of faith. St. Paul speaks of works wrought in obedience to the law of Moses, and before men’s embracing the faith of the Gospel; and he had to do with those who valued themselves so highly upon those works that they rejected the Gospel, as Rom. x. at the beginning most expressly declares. But St. James speaks of works done in obedience to the Gospel, and as the proper and necessary effects and fruits of a sound believing in Christ Jesus. Both are concerned to magnify the faith of the Gospel as that which alone could save us and justify us. But St. Paul magnifies it by shewing the insufficiency of any works of the law before faith, or in opposition to the doctrine of justification by Jesus Christ. St. James magnifies the same faith by shewing what are the genuine and necessary products and operations of it.

2. St. Paul does not only speak of different works from those insisted on by St. James, but he speaks of quite a different use that was made of good works from what is here urged and intended. St. Paul had to do with those who depended on the merit of their works in the sight of God; and thus he might well make them of no manner of account. St. James had to do with those that cried up faith, but would not allow works to be used even as evidences. They depended upon a bare profession as sufficient to justify them; and with these he might well urge the necessity and vast importance of good works. As we must not break one table of the law, by dashing it against the other, so neither must we break in pieces the law and the Gospel by making them clash with one another. Those that cry up the Gospel so as to set aside the law, and those that cry up the law so as to set aside the Gospel, are both in the wrong. For we must take our work before us; there must be both faith in Jesus Christ and good works the fruit of faith.

3. The justification of which St. Paul speaks is different from that spoken of by St. James. The one speaks of our persons being justified before God; the other speaks of our faith being justified before men. “Shew me thy faith by thy works,” says St. James. Let thy faith be justified in the eyes of them that behold thee by thy works. But St. Paul speaks of justification in the sight of God; who justifies them only that believe in Jesus, and purely on account of the redemption that is in him. And thus we see that our persons are justified before God by faith; but our faith is justified before men by works. And this is so plainly the scope and design of the apostle James, that he is but confirming what St. Paul in other places says of his faith, that it is a “laborious faith,” and a “faith working by love,” Gal. v. 6; 1 Thes. i. 3; Tit. iii. 8; and many other places.

4. St. Paul may be understood as speaking of that justification which is inchoate, St. James of that which is complete. It is by faith only that we put into a justified state; but then good works come in for the completing of our justification at the last great day. Then, “Come ye children of my Father;” “For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat,” &c.

Thus, having cleared this part of Scripture from every thing of a contradiction to other parts of it, let us see what is more particularly to be learnt from this excellent passage of James. We are taught,

First. That faith without works will not profit, and cannot save us; ver. 14, “What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him?” Observe here,

1. That faith which does not save will not really profit us. A bare profession may sometimes seem to be profitable, to gain the good opinion of those who are truly good, and it may procure in some cases worldly good things; but what profit will this be, for any to gain the world and to lose their souls? “What doth it profit?” “Can faith save him?” All things should be accounted profitable or unprofitable to us as they tend to forward or hinder the salvation of our souls. And above all other things we should take care thus to make account of faith, as that which does not profit if it do not save, but will aggravate our condemnation and destruction at last.

2. That for a man to have faith and to say he has faith are two different things. The apostle does not say, If a man have faith without works, for that is not a supposable case. The drift of this place of Scripture is plainly to shew, that an opinion, or speculation, or assent without works, is not faith. But the case is put thus, If “a man say he hath faith,” &c. Men may boast of that to others, and be conceited of that in themselves, which yet they are really destitute of.

Secondly. We are taught that, as love or charity is an operative principle, so is faith, or that neither of them are good for any thing. And by trying how it looks for a person to pretend he is very charitable who yet never does any works of charity, you may judge what sense there is in pretending to have faith without the proper and necessary fruits of it; ver. 15–17, “If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?” What will such a charity as this, that consists in bare words, avail either you or the poor? Will you come before God with such empty shows of charity as these? Why, you might as well pretend that your love and charity will stand the test without acts of mercy, as think that a profession of faith will bear you out before God without works of piety and obedience; ver. 17. Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.” We are too apt to rest in a bare profession of faith, and to think that this will save us. It is a cheap and easy religion to say, We believe the articles of the Christian faith; but it is a great delusion to imagine that this is enough to bring us to heaven. Those that argue thus wrong God, and put a cheat upon their own souls. A mock faith is as hateful as a mock charity, and both shew a heart dead to all real godliness. You may as soon take pleasure in a dead body, void of soul, or sense, or action, as God take pleasure in a dead faith, where there is no works.

Thirdly. We are taught to compare a faith boasting of itself without works, and a faith evidenced by works, by looking on both together, to try how that will work upon our minds; ver. 18, “Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works; shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.” Suppose a true believer thus pleading with a boasting hypocrite, “Thou makest a profession, and sayest thou hast faith; I make no such boasts, but leave my works to speak for me. Now give any evidence of having the faith thou professest without works if thou canst, and I will soon let thee see how my works flow from, and are the undoubted evidences of, faith.” This is the evidence by which the Scriptures all along teach men to judge both of themselves and others. And this is the evidence according to which Christ will proceed at the day of judgment; Rev. xx. 12, “The dead were judged according to their works.” How will they be exposed, then, who boast of that which they cannot evidence, or who go about to evidence their faith by any thing but works of piety and mercy!

Fourthly. We are taught to look upon a faith of bare speculation and knowledge as the faith of devils; ver. 19, “Thou believest that there is one God, thou doest well; the devils also believe and tremble.” That instance of faith which the apostle here chooses to mention is the first principle of all religion. Thou believest there is a God, against the atheists; and that there is but one God, against the idolaters; thou doest well, so far all is right. But to rest here, and take up a good opinion of thyself, or of thy state towards God, merely on account of thy believing in him, this will render thee miserable; “The devils also believe and tremble.” If thou contentest thyself with a bare assent to articles of faith, and some speculations upon them, thus far the devils go; and as their faith and knowledge only serve to excite horror, so in a little time will thine. The word “tremble” is commonly looked upon as denoting a good effect of faith; but here it may rather be taken as a bad effect, when applied to the faith of devils. They tremble not out of reverence, but hatred and opposition, to that one God on whom they believe. To rehearse that article of our creed, therefore, “I believe in God the Father Almighty,” will not distinguish us from devils at last, unless we now give up ourselves to God as the Gospel directs, and love him, and delight ourselves in him, and serve him, which the devils do not, cannot do.

Fifthly. We are taught that he who boasts of faith without works is to be looked upon at present as a foolish, condemned person; ver. 20, “But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead?” The words translated “vain man,” ἀνθρωπος κενός, are observed to have the same signification with the word “vaca,” which must never be used to private persons, or as an effect of anger, Mat. v. 22, but may be used as here, to denote a just detestation of such a sort of men as are empty of good works, and yet boasters of their faith; and it plainly declares them fools and objects in the sight of God. Faith without works is said to be dead, not only as void of all those operations which are the proofs of spiritual life, but as unavailable to eternal life. Such believers as rest in a bare profession of faith are dead while they live.

Sixthly. We are taught that a justifying faith cannot be without works, from two examples, Abraham and Rahab.

1. The first instance is that of Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the prime example of justification; to whom the Jews had a special regard; ver. 21, “Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar?” St. Paul, on the other hand, says, in the 4th chapter of the epistle to the Romans, that “Abraham believed, and it was counted to him for righteousness.” But these are well reconciled, by observing what is said in Heb. xi., which shews that the faith both of Abraham and Rahab was such as to produce those good works of which St. James speaks, and which are not to be separated from faith as justifying and saving. By what Abraham did it appeared that he truly believed. Upon this footing the words of God himself plainly put this matter; Gen. xxii. 16, 17, “Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, therefore in blessing I will bless thee.” Thus the faith of Abraham was a working faith; ver. 22, “It wrought with his works, and by works was made perfect.” And by this means you come to the true sense of that Scripture which saith, ver. 23, “Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness;” and thus he became the friend of God. Faith, producing such works, endeared him to the Divine Being, and advanced him to very peculiar favours and intimacies with God. It is a great honour done to Abraham that he is called and counted the friend of God. You see there, ver. 24, “how that by works a man is justified,” comes into such a state of favour and friendship with God, “and not by faith only;” not by a bare opinion or profession, or believing without obeying, but by having such a faith as is productive of good works. Now besides the explication of this passage and example, as thus illustrating and supporting the argument St. James is upon, many other useful lessons may be learned by us, from what is here said concerning Abraham. 1st. Those that would have Abraham’s blessings must be careful to copy after his faith. To boast of being Abraham’s seed will not avail any, if they do not believe as he did. 2nd. Those works which evidence true faith must be works of self-denial, and such as God himself commands, as Abraham’s offering up his son, his only son, was, and not such works as are pleasing to flesh and blood, and may serve our interest, or are the mere fruits of our own imagination and devising. 3rd. What we piously purpose, and sincerely resolve, to do for God, is accepted as if actually performed. Thus Abraham is regarded as offering up his son, though he did not actually proceed to make a sacrifice of him. It was a done thing in the mind, and spirit, and resolution of Abraham, and God accepts it as if fully performed and accomplished. 4th. The actings of faith make it grow perfect, as the truth of faith makes it act. 5th. Such an acting faith will make others, as well as Abraham, friends of God. Thus Christ says to his disciples, Jno. xv. 15, “I have called you friends.” All transactions betwixt God and the truly believing soul are easy, pleasant, and delightful. There is one will and one heart, and there is a mutual complacency. God rejoiceth over them that truly believe to do them good, and they delight themselves in him.

2. The second example of faith’s justifying itself and us with and by works, is Rahab; ver. 25, “Likewise also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?” The former instance was of one renowned for his faith all his life long; this is of one noted for sin, whose faith was meaner, and of a much lower degree, so that the strongest faith will not do, nor the meanest be allowed to go, without works. Some say that the word here rendered harlot was the proper name of Rahab. Others tell us, that it signifies no more than an hostess, or one that keeps a public house, with whom, therefore, the spies lodged. But it is very probable her character was infamous; and such an

iii. 1. “Masters,” as Authorised Version, or “teachers:” in the first case the signification would be “censors,” or judges of others; in the second, “teachers,” publicly in the congregation. The apostle is warning the members of the church against over-eagerness to teach others—against taking upon themselves, of their own will and too hastily, the office of teaching; for if that office is not faithfully performed, the erring teacher incurs a stronger condemnation than those who are not teachers.

iii. 2. “Offend not in word:” a form of offence to which a teacher is specially liable, as having more opportunities of speaking than others.

iii. 3. The fact just asserted, that one who can govern the tongue can bridle the whole body, is exemplified by the fact that the horse is ruled by the bit. “Behold” of Authorised Version is not supported by best MSS. The true reading is, “But if,” &c., “we turn about their whole body.”

instance is mentioned to shew that faith will save the worst, when evidenced by proper works; and it will not save the best without such works as God requires. This Rahab believed the report she had heard of God's powerful presence with Israel; but that which proved her faith sincere was, that to the hazard of her life she "received the messengers, and sent them another way." Observe here, 1st. The wonderful power of faith in transforming and changing sinners. 2nd. The regard which an operative faith meets with from God, to obtain his mercy and favour. 3rd. Observe, that where great sins are pardoned there must be great acts of self-denial. Rahab must prefer the honour of God, and the good of his people, before the preservation of her own country. Her former acquaintance must be discarded, and her former course of life entirely abandoned; and she must give signal proof and evidence of this before she can be in a justified state. 4th. After she is justified, yet her former character must be remembered; not so much to her dishonour as to glorify the rich grace and mercy of God. Though justified, she is called "Rahab the harlot."

Seventhly. And now, upon the whole matter, the apostle draws this conclusion: ver. 26, "As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also." These words are read differently, some reading them, As the body without the breath is dead, so is faith without works; and then they shew that works are the companions of faith, as breathing is of life. Others read them, As the body without the soul is dead, so faith without works is dead also; and then they shew that as the body has no action nor beauty, but becomes a loathsome carcass when the soul is gone, so a bare profession without works is useless, yea, loathsome and offensive. [The former is the true rendering, otherwise the analogy does not hold. Good works are not the soul of faith, but they are to it what respiration is to the body, the evidence of life.] Let us, then, take heed of running into extremes in this case; for, 1. The best works without faith are dead; they want their root and principle. It is by faith that any thing we do is really good, as done with an eye to God, and in obedience to him, and so as to aim principally at his acceptance. 2. The most plausible profession of faith, without works, is dead, as the root is dead when it produces nothing green, nothing of fruit. Faith is the root, good works are the fruits: and we must see to it that we have both. We must not think that either, without the other, will justify and save us. This is the grace of God wherein we stand, and we should stand to it.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle here reproves ambition, and an arrogant magisterial tongue; and shews the duty and advantage of bridling it, because of its power to do mischief. Those who profess religion ought especially to govern their tongues, ver. 1—12; true wisdom makes men meek, and avoiders of strife and envy; and hereby may easily be distinguished from a wisdom that is earthly and hypocritical, ver. 13—18.

Y brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation. 2 For in many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body. 3 Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body. 4 Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth. 5 Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth! 6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell. 7 For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of

iii. 4, 5. These verses must be taken in connection, as a comparison. "Boasteth great things;" "Vaunts great words, which bring about great acts of mischief" (Alford). Verse 5 should end with "great things." A new comparison is introduced with "behold." The Authorised Version, "how great a matter," is incorrect. "Lo, how little fire burneth a full great wood" (Wickliffe). "Behold how much fire, what a great wood it kindleth" (Rheims).

iii. 6. The stop at "iniquity" is omitted by Tischendorf and 968 things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind: 8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison. 9 Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. 10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. 11 Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter? 12 Can the fig tree, my brethren, bear olive berries? either a vine, figs? so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.

HUNTING WITH HAWKS.—VER. 7.

The foregoing chapter shews how unprofitable and dead faith is without works; it is plainly intimated by what this chapter first goes upon, that such a faith is, however, apt to make men conceited and magisterial in their tempers and their talk. Those who set up faith in the manner the former chapter condemns are most apt to run into those sins of the tongue which this chapter condemns; and indeed the best need to be cautioned against a dictating, censorious, mischievous use of their tongues. We are therefore taught,

First. Not to use our tongues so as to lord it over others; ver. 1, "My brethren, be not many masters," &c. These words do not forbid doing what we can to direct and instruct others in the way of their duty, or to reprove them in a Christian way for what is amiss; but we must not affect to speak and act as those that are continually assuming the chair. We must not prescribe one to another, so as to make our own sentiments a standard, by which to try all others; because God gives various gifts to men, and expects from each according to that measure of light which he gives. Therefore be not many masters, or teachers, as some read it. Do not give yourselves the air of teachers, and imposers, and judges, but rather speak with the humility and spirit of learners. Do not censure one another, as if all must be brought to your standard. This is enforced by two reasons: 1. Those who thus set up for judges and censurers shall receive the greater condemnation. Our judging others will but make our own judgment the more strict and severe, Mat. vii. 1, 2. Those who are curious to spy out the faults of others, and arrogant in passing censures upon them, may expect that God will be as extreme in marking what they say and do amiss. 2. Another reason given against such acting the master is, because we are all sinners; ver. 2, "In many things we offend all." Were we to think more on our own mistakes and offences we should be less apt to judge other people. Whilst we are severe against what we count offensive in others, we do not consider how much there is in us which is justly offensive to them. Self-justifiers are commonly self-deceivers. We are all guilty before God; and they that vaunt it over the frailties and infirmities of others little think how many things they offend in themselves. Nay, perhaps their magisterial managements and censorious tongues may prove worse than any faults they condemn in others. Let us learn to be severe in judging ourselves, but charitable in our judgments of other people.

Secondly. We are taught to govern our tongues so as to prove ourselves perfect and upright men, and such as have an entire government over ourselves. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." It is here implied that he who makes conscience of tongue sins, and takes care to avoid them, is an upright man, and has an undoubted sign of true grace. But, on the other hand, if a man "seem to be religious," as was declared in the first chapter, "and brideth not his tongue," whatever profession he makes, that man's "religion is vain." Farther, he that "offends not in word" will not only prove himself a sincere Christian, but a very much advanced and improved Christian. For that wisdom and grace which enables him to rule his tongue will enable him also to rule all his actions.

This we have illustrated by two comparisons:—
1. The governing and guiding all the motions of a horse by the bit which is put into his mouth; ver. 3, "Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us, and we turn about their whole body." There is a great deal of brutish fierceness and wantonness in us; this shews itself very much by the Lachmann, on the authority of several of the best MSS., and they read, "A world of iniquity is the tongue amongst our members, defiling," &c.

iii. 7. Not "every kind of beasts," &c., as Authorised Version, but "every nature"—i.e., disposition, or character—"hath been tamed by the nature of man."

iii. 9. "The Lord and Father;" so best MSS. "After the similitude of God:" man, no doubt, has lost much of his likeness to God; tongue, so that this must be bridled, according to Ps. xxxix. 1, "I will keep my mouth with a bridle," or, I will bridle my mouth, "while the wicked is before me." The more quick and lively the tongue is, the more should we thus take care to govern it. Otherwise, as an unruly and ungovernable horse runs away with his rider, or throws him, so an unruly tongue will serve those in like manner that have no command over it. Whereas, let resolution and watchfulness, under the influence of the grace of God, bridle the tongue, and then all the motions and actions of the whole body will be easily guided and overruled.

2. The governing of a ship by the right management of the helm; ver. 4, 5, "Behold also the ships, which, though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth; even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things." As the helm is a very small part of the ship, so is the tongue a very small part of the body; but the right governing of the helm or rudder will steer and turn the ship as the governor pleases, and a right management of the tongue is, in a great measure, the government of the whole man. There is a wonderful beauty in these comparisons, to shew how things of small bulk yet may be of vast use. And from hence we should learn to make the due management of our tongues more our study, because though they are little members they are capable of doing a great deal of good or a great deal of hurt. [A single word may sometimes stir the very depths of human passion, and may make an ineffaceable impression upon the mind of the hearer. No wonder it is said, "By thy words shalt thou be justified, and by thy words shalt thou be condemned."] Therefore,

Thirdly. We are taught to dread an unruly tongue, as one of the greatest and most pernicious evils. It is compared to "a little fire" placed amongst a great deal of combustible matter, which soon raises a flame and consumes all before it; ver. 5, 6, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth; and the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity," &c. There is such an abundance of sin in the tongue that it may be called a "world of iniquity." How many defilements does it occasion! how many and dreadful flames does it kindle! "So is the tongue among the members, that it defileth the whole body." Observe from hence, there is a great pollution and defilement in sins of the tongue. Defiling passions are kindled, and vented, and cherished, by this unruly member; and the whole body is often drawn into sin and guilt by the tongue. Therefore Solomon says, "Suffer not thy mouth to cause thy flesh to sin," Ecc. v. 6. The snares into which men are sometimes led by the tongue are insufferable to themselves and destructive of others. It "setteth on fire the course of nature;" "course of nature," that is, the whole course of life, the whole conduct. The affairs of mankind, and of societies, are often thrown into confusion, and all is on a flame, by the tongues of men. Some read it, All our generations are set on fire by the tongue. There is no age of the world, nor any condition of life, private or public, but will afford examples of this. "And it is set on fire of hell." Observe from hence, that hell has more to do in promoting the fire of the tongue than men are generally aware of. It is from some diabolical temptations, and to serve some diabolical designs, that men's tongues are inflamed. The devil is expressly called a liar, a murderer, an accuser of the brethren; and whenever men's tongues are employed in any of these ways, they are "set on fire of hell." The Holy Ghost, indeed, once descended in "cloven tongues as of fire," Acts ii. And where the tongue is thus guided and wrought upon by a fire from heaven, there it kindleth good thoughts, holy affections, and ardent devotions; but when it is set on fire of hell, as in all undue heats it is, there it is mischievous, producing rage and hatred, and those things which serve the purposes and designs of the devil. As, therefore, you would dread fires and flames, you should dread contentions, revilings, slanders, lies, and every thing that would kindle the fire of wrath in your own or others' spirits. But,

Fourthly. We are next taught how very hard a thing it is to govern the tongue; ver. 7, 8, "For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind; but the tongue can no man tame." As if the apostle had said, Lions, and the most savage beasts, as well as horses, and camels, and creatures of the greatest strength, have been tamed and governed by men; and so have birds, notwithstanding their wildness and timorousness, and their wings to bear them up continually out of our reach. And even serpents, notwithstanding all their venom, and all their cunning, yet have been made familiar and harmless; and things in the sea have been taken by men and made serviceable to them. And these creatures have not been subdued or tamed only by miracle,—as the lions crouched to Daniel, instead of devouring him; and ravens fed Elijah; and a whale carried Jonah through the depths of the sea to dry land,—but what is here spoken of is something commonly done; not only hath been tamed, but is tamed of mankind. Yet the tongue is worse than these, and cannot be tamed by that power and art which serves to tame these things. "No man can tame the tongue" without supernatural grace and assistance. The apostle does not intend to represent it as a thing impossible [in itself], but as a thing extremely difficult, and therefore will require great watchfulness, and pains, and prayer to keep it in due order. [Unless Divine grace interposes, the right government of the tongue is impossible. Men may restrain themselves from angry words, but to use the tongue aright, to speak what they ought to speak, and to do so at the right time, surpasses the power of the natural man.] And sometimes all is too little; "For it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison." Brute creatures may be kept within certain bounds, they may be managed by certain rules, and even serpents may be so used as to do no hurt with all their poison. But the tongue is apt to break through all bounds and rules, and to spit out its poison on one occasion or other, notwithstanding the utmost care. So that it does not need only to be watched, and guarded, and governed as much as an unruly beast, or a hurtful and poisonous creature, but much more care and pains will be needful to prevent the mischievous outbursts and effects of the tongue. However,

Fifthly. We are taught to think of the use we make of our tongues in religion, and in the service of God, and by such a consideration to keep it from cursing, censuring, and every thing that is evil, on other occasions; ver. 9, 10, "Therewith bless we God even the Father; and therewith curse we men which are made after the similitude of God. Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be." How absurd is it, that they who use their tongues in prayer and praise should ever use them in cursing, slandering, and the like? If we bless God as our Father, it should teach us to speak well of, and kindly to, all that bear his image. That tongue that addresses with reverence the Divine being, cannot without the greatest inconsistency turn upon fellow-creatures with reviling, brawling language. It is said of the seraphim, [rather, of Michael the archangel, Jude 9. The Scripture gives us too little information respecting the angelic world to warrant such a use of the term seraphim as is made by the annotator. In Isa. vi. 2, 6, the name is given to the heavenly hosts; but whether Michael the archangel, who contended about the body of Moses, may properly be called a seraph, is a point which we cannot determine. On such topics we should not go beyond the very words of the Bible,] that praise God, they dare not bring a railing accusation; and for men to reproach those who have not only the image of God in their natural faculties, but are renewed after the image of God by the grace of the Gospel, this is a most shameful contradiction to all their pretensions of honouring the great

Original. "These things ought not so to be;" and, if such considerations were always at hand, surely they would not be. Piety is disgraced in all the shews of it, if there be not charity. That tongue confutes itself, that one while pretends to adore the perfections of God, and to refer all things to him, and another while will condemn even good men, if they do not just come up to the same words or expressions used by itself.

Farther, to fix this thought, the apostle shews that contrary effects from the same cause are monstrous, and not to be found in nature, and therefore cannot be consistent with grace; ver. 11, 12, "Doth a fountain send forth, at the same place, sweet water and bitter? Can the fig-tree bear olive berries? either a vine, figs? Or doth the same spring yield both salt water and fresh?" True religion will not admit of contradictions, and a truly religious man can never allow of them either in his words or his actions. How many sins would this prevent, and recover men from, to put them upon being always consistent with themselves! [A holy heart is a fountain from which pure and living waters ever will and must flow; if the precious faith of God's elect dwells in the soul, holy love, joy, peace, meekness, yea, every grace, will be more or less exhibited in the daily conduct.]

13 Who is a wise man and endued with knowledge among you? let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom. 14 But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not, and lie not against the truth. 15 This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. 16 For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. 17 But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. 18 And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.

As the sins before condemned arise from an affectation of being thought more wise than others, and being endued with more knowledge than they, so the apostle in these verses shews the difference betwixt men's pretending to be wise and their being really so; and betwixt wisdom which is from beneath, from earth or hell, and that which is from above.

First. We have some account of true wisdom, with the distinguishing marks and fruits of it; ver. 13, "Who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge amongst you? Let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom." A truly wise man is a very knowing man. He will not set up for the reputation of being wise, without laying in a good stock of knowledge; and he will not value himself merely upon knowing things, if he has not wisdom to make a right application and use of that knowledge. These two things must be put together to make up the account of true wisdom; "Who is wise, and endued with knowledge?" Now where this is the happy case of any, there will be these following things:—

1. A good conversation. If we are wiser than others, this should be evidenced by the goodness of our conversation, not by the roughness or vanity of it. Words that inform, and heal, and do good, are the marks of wisdom; and not those that look great, and do mischief, and are the occasions of evil, either in ourselves or others. [The good conversation of the truly wise man will be shown by his acting suitably to the condition in which the providence of God has placed him; however humble it may be, he will labour to do the will of God diligently, cheerfully, meekly.]

2. True wisdom may be known by its works. The conversation here does not refer only to words, but to the whole of men's practice; therefore it is said, Let him shew out of a good conversation his works. True wisdom does not lie in good notions or speculations so much as in good and useful actions. Not he that thinks well, or he that talks well, that in the sense of Scripture is allowed to be wise, if he do not live and act well.

3. True wisdom may be known by the meekness of the spirit and temper; "Let him shew with meekness," &c. It is a great instance of wisdom prudently to bridle our own anger, and patiently to bear the anger of others. And as wisdom will evidence itself in meekness, so meekness will be a great friend to wisdom. For nothing hinders that regular apprehension, solid judgment, and impartiality of thought, which is necessary to our acting wisely, so much as passion doth. When we are mild and calm, we are best able to hear reason, and best able to speak it. Wisdom produces meekness, and meekness increaseth wisdom.

Secondly. We have the glorying of those taken away that are of a contrary character to that now mentioned, and their wisdom exposed in all its boasts and productions; ver. 14–16, "If ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not," &c. Pretend what you will, and think yourselves never so wise, ye have abundance of reason to cease your glorying, if you run down love and peace, and give way to bitter envying and strife. Your zeal for truth or orthodoxy, and your boasts of knowing more than others, if you do this only to make others hateful and to shew your own spite, and heart-burnings against them, is a shame to your profession of Christianity, and a downright contradiction to it. Lie not thus against the truth. Observe,

1. That envying and strife are opposed to the meekness of wisdom. The heart is the seat of both; but envy and wisdom cannot dwell together in the same heart. Holy zeal and bitter envying are as different as the flames of seraphim and the fire of hell.

2. The order of things here laid down. Envying is first, and excites strife; strife endeavours to excuse itself by vain-glorying and lying; and then, ver. 16, hereupon ensues "confusion and every evil work." Those that live in malice, and envy, and contention, they live in confusion, and are liable to be provoked and hurried to any evil work. Such disorders raise many temptations, and strengthen temptations, and involve men in a great deal of guilt. One sin begets another, and it cannot be imagined how much mischief is produced; there is every evil work; and is such wisdom to be gloried in as produces these effects? This cannot be without giving the lie to Christianity, and pretending that this wisdom is what it is not. For observe,

3. From whence such wisdom cometh. It "descendeth not from above," but ariseth from beneath; and, to speak plainly, it is "earthly, sensual, devilish," ver. 15. It springs from earthly principles, and acts upon earthly motives, and is intent upon serving earthly purposes. It is sensual, indulging the flesh, and but he retains much—body, soul, spirit (1 Thess. v. 23), a triune nature—the creative faculty, in a sense in which no other creature possesses it, &c.

iii. 12. Literally, "nor can salt bring forth sweet water." "If the mouth emit cursing, thereby making itself a brackish spring, it cannot to any purpose also emit the sweet stream of praise and good words; if it appear to do so, all must be hypocrisy and mere seeming" (Alford).

iii. 14. Not as in Authorised Version, "strife in your hearts;" the word so translated signifies rivalry or party spirit, not strife generally.

iii. 15. "Sensual" does not convey the real meaning, which, indeed, can hardly be expressed in an epithet. The word in the original has reference to the soul, as distinguished from the spirit. Trench remarks on this word ("New Testament Synonyms"), "That old philosophy knew of nothing higher than the soul of man; but reve-making provision to fulfil the lusts and desires of it. Or, according to the original word, ψυχῆς, it is animal or human; the mere working of natural reason without any supernatural light. And it is devilish; such wisdom being the wisdom of devils to create uneasiness, and to do hurt, and being inspired by devils, whose condemnation is pride, 1 Tim. iii. 6, and who are noted in other places of Scripture for their wrath, and their accusing of the brethren; and, therefore, those who are lifted up with such wisdom as this must fall into the condemnation of the devil.

Thirdly. We have the lovely picture of that wisdom which is from above more fully drawn, and set in opposition to this which is from beneath; ver. 17, 18, "But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable," &c. Observe here that true wisdom is God's gift. It is not gained by conversing with men, or by the knowledge of the world, (as some think and speak,) but it comes from above. And it consists of these several things:—

1. It is "pure," without mixture of maxims or aims that would debase it. And it is free from iniquity and defilements, not allowing of any known sin, but studious of holiness both in heart and life.

2. The wisdom that is from above is "peaceable." Peace follows purity, and depends upon it. Those who are truly wise do what they can to preserve peace, that it may not be broken; and to make peace, that where it is lost it may be restored. In kingdoms, in families, in churches, in all societies, and in all affairs and converses, heavenly wisdom makes men peaceable.

3. It is "gentle," not standing upon extreme right in matters of property; not saying or doing any thing rigorous in points of censure, not being furious about opinions, urging our own beyond their weight, or theirs who oppose us beyond their intention; not being rude and overbearing in conversation, nor harsh and cruel in temper. Gentleness may thus be opposed to all these.

4. Heavenly wisdom is "easy to be entreated;" εὐμενής, it is very persuadable, either to what is good, or from what is evil. There is an easiness that is weak and faulty; but it is not a blameable easiness to yield ourselves to the persuasions of God's word, and to all just and reasonable counsels or requests of our fellow-creatures; no, nor to give up a dispute where there appears a good reason for it, and a good end may be answered by it.

5. Heavenly wisdom is full of mercy and good fruits. Inwardly disposed to every thing that is kind and good, both to relieve those that want, and forgive those that offend, and actually to do this whenever proper occasions offer.

6. Heavenly wisdom is "without partiality." The original word, ἀδύκροτος, signifies to be 'without suspicion,' or free from judging; making no undue surmises, or differences in our carriage toward one person more than another. The margin reads it 'without wrangling.' Not acting the part of sectaries, and disputing merely for the sake of a party; or censuring others purely on account of their differing from us. The wisest men are least apt to be censurers.

7. That wisdom which is from above is "without hypocrisy." It has no disguises or deceptions. It cannot fall in with those managements the world counts wise, which are crafty and guileful; but it is sincere and open, and steady and uniform, and consistent with itself. O that you and I might always be guided by such wisdom as this! That with St. Paul we might be able to say, "Not with fleshly wisdom, but in simplicity and godly sincerity, by the grace of God, we have our conversation." And then,

8. True wisdom will go on to sow the fruits of righteousness in peace; and thus, if it may be, to make peace in the world, ver. 18; and that which is sown in peace will produce a harvest of joys. Let others reap the fruits of contentions, and all the advantages they can propose to themselves by them; but let us go on peacefully to sow the seeds of righteousness, and we may depend upon it our labour shall not be lost. For "light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart;" and the "work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever."

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter we are directed to consider, I. Some causes of contention, besides those mentioned in the foregoing chapter, and to watch against them, ver. 1–5. II. We are taught to abandon the friendship of this world, so as to submit and subject ourselves entirely to God, ver. 4–10. III. All detraction and rash judgment of others is to be carefully avoided, ver. 11, 12. IV. We must preserve a constant regard and pay the utmost deference to the disposals of Divine providence, ver. 13–17.

FROM whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? 2 Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. 3 Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts. 4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God? whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world is the enemy of God. 5 Do ye think that the scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy? 6 But he giveth more grace. Wherefore he saith, God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble. 7 Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you. 8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double minded. 9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness. 10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up.

The former chapter speaks of envying one another, as the great spring of strifes and contentions. This chapter speaks of a lust after worldly things, and a setting too great value upon worldly pleasures and friendships, as that which carried their divisions to a shameful height. And therefore the apostle here,

First. Reproves the Jewish Christians for their wars, and for their lusts, as the cause of them; ver. 1, "From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts, that war in your members?" The Jews were a very seditious people, and had therefore frequent wars with the Romans; and they were a very quarrelsome, divided people, often fighting among themselves; and many of those corrupt Christians, against whose errors and vices this epistle was written, seem to have fallen in with the common quarrels. Hereupon our apostle informs them that the original of their wars and fightings was not (as they pretended) a true zeal for their country, and for the honour of God; but that their prevailing lusts were the cause of all. Observe from thence, that many times what is sheltered and shrouded under a specious pretence of zeal for God and religion, yet really comes from men's pride, malice, covetousness, ambition, and revenge. The Jews had many struggles with the Roman power before they were entirely destroyed. They often unnecessarily embroiled themselves, and then fell into parties and factions about the different methods of managing their wars with their common enemies; and hence it comes to pass, that when their cause might be supposed good, yet their engaging in it, and their management of it, came from a bad principle; their worldly and fleshly lusts raised and managed their wars and fightings; but one would think here is enough said to subdue those lusts. For,

1. They make a war within, as well as fightings without. Impetuous passions and desires first war in their members, and then raise feuds in their nation. There is war between conscience and corruption, and there is war also between one corruption and another, and from these contentions in themselves arose their quarrels with each other. Apply this to private cases, and may we not then say of fightings and strifes among relations and neighbours, that they come from those lusts which war in their members? From lust of power and dominion, lust of pleasure, or lust of riches, from some one or more of these lusts arise all the broils and contentions that are in the world. And since all wars and fightings come from the corruptions of our own hearts, it is therefore the right method for the cure of contention to lay the axe to the root, and mortify here those lusts that war in the members.

2. It should kill these lusts to think of their disappointment; ver. 2, "Ye lust and have not, ye kill and desire to have, and cannot obtain." You covet great things for yourselves, and you think to obtain them by your victories over the Romans, or by suppressing this and the other party among yourselves. You think you shall secure great pleasures and happiness to yourselves by overthrowing every thing which thwarts your eager wishes. But, alas! you are losing your labour and your blood, while you kill one another with such views as these. Inordinate desires are either totally disappointed, or, however, not to be appeased and satisfied by obtaining the things desired. The words here rendered "cannot obtain," signify cannot gain the happiness sought after. Note hence, that worldly and fleshly lusts are a distemper which will not allow of contentment or satisfaction in the mind.

3. Sinful desires and affections generally exclude prayer, and the working of our desires towards God. "Ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not." You fight and do not succeed, because you do not pray. You do not consult God in your undertakings, whether he allow of them or not. And you do not commit your way to him, and make known your requests to him, but follow your own corrupt views and inclinations, therefore you meet with continual disappointments. Or else,

4. Your lusts spoil your prayers, and make them an abomination to God whenever you put them up to him; ver. 3, "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that you may consume it upon your lusts;" as if it had been said, "Though perhaps you may sometimes pray for success against your enemies, yet it is not your aim to improve the advantages you gain so as to promote true piety and religion, either in yourselves or others; but pride, and vanity, and luxury, and sensuality, is what you would serve by your successes and by your very prayers. You want to live in great power and plenty, in voluptuousness and a sensual prosperity; and thus you disgrace devotion and dishonour God by such gross and base ends, and therefore your prayers are rejected."

Let us learn from hence, in the management of all our worldly affairs, and in our prayers to God for success in them, to see that our ends be right. When men follow their worldly business, (suppose them tradesmen or husbandmen,) and ask of God prosperity, but do not receive what they ask for, it is often because they ask with wrong aims and intentions. They ask God to give them success in their callings or undertakings, not that they may glorify their heavenly Father, and do good with what they have, but that they may "consume it upon their lusts;" that they may be enabled to eat better meat, and drink better drink, and wear better clothes, and so gratify their pride, and vanity, and voluptuousness. But if we thus seek the things of this world, it is just in God to deny them; whereas if we seek any thing that we may serve God with it, we may expect he will either give what we seek for, or give hearts to be content without it, and give opportunities of serving and glorifying him some other way. Let us remember this, that when we speed not in our prayers, it is because we ask amiss. Either we do not ask for right ends, or not in a right manner; not with faith, or not with fervency. Unbelieving and cold desires beg denials. And this we may be sure of, that when our prayers are rather the language of our lusts than of our graces, they will return empty.

Secondly. We have fair warning to avoid all criminal friendships with this world; ver. 4, "Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God?" [They are guilty of spiritual adultery; they break the solemn vow and covenant to be the Lord's, into which they once entered. From hence we may learn how great is their guilt.] Worldly people are here called adulterers and adulteresses, because of their perfidiousness to God, whilst they give their best affections to the world. Covetousness is elsewhere called idolatry, and it is here called adultery. It is a forsaking him to whom we are devoted and espoused, to cleave to other things. There is this brand put upon worldly-mindedness, that it is enmity to God. A man may have a competent portion of the good things of this life, and yet may keep himself in the love of God; but he that sets his heart upon the world, that places his happiness in it, and will conform himself to it, and do any thing rather than lose its friendship, he is an enemy to God. It is constructive treason and rebellion against God to set the world upon his throne in our hearts. "Whoever, therefore, would be a friend of the world is an enemy to God." He lution knows of the Spirit of God, and of him making his habitation with men, and calling out an answering spirit in them. The ψυχῆς of Scripture is one for whom the ψυχῆς (soul) is the highest motive power of life and action; in whom the spirit, as the organ of the Divine Spirit, is suppressed, dormant—for the time as good as extinct; whom the operations of this Divine Spirit have never lifted into the region of spiritual things."

iv. 4. The best MSS. omit "ye adulterers," and Theile and others argue it is unnecessary; for God is the Lord and husband of every soul that is his as well as of the Church, and the indignation "ye adulteresses" of the apostle applies as well to each one who forsakes his or her God as to an apostate church.

iv. 5. The quotation is not in the actual words, but the general sense of Scripture. It continues the idea above, according to De Wette, Alford, and others, thus: "The spirit that he hath placed in us jealously desireth us"—i.e., God is a jealous God over those that will act upon this principle, to keep in the smiles of the world, and to have its continual friendship, cannot but shew himself in spirit, and in his actions too, an enemy to God. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon," Mat. vi. 24. From hence arise wars and fightings, even from this adulterous, idolatrous love of the world, and serving of it. For what peace can there be among men so long as there is enmity towards God? Or who can fight against God and prosper? Think seriously with yourselves what the spirit of the world is, and you will find that you cannot suit yourselves to it as friends, but it must occasion your being envious and full of evil inclinations, as the generality of the world are. "Do you think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy?" ver. 5. The account given in the holy Scriptures of the hearts of men by nature is evil. "That their imagination is evil," only evil, and that continually," Gen. vi. 5. Natural corruption principally shews itself by envying; and there is a continual propensity to this. The spirit which naturally dwells in man is always producing one evil imagination or another; always enululating such as we see and converse with, and seeking those things which are possessed and enjoyed by them. Now this way of the world, affecting pomp and pleasure, and falling into strifes and quarrels for the sake of these things, is the certain consequence of being friends to the world; for there is no friendship without a oneness of spirit. And therefore Christians, to avoid contentions, must avoid the friendship of the world, and must shew that they are actuated by nobler principles, and that a nobler spirit dwelleth in them. For if we belong to God, he giveth more grace than to live and act as the generality of the world do. The spirit of the world teaches men to be churls, God teaches them to be bountiful. The spirit of the world teaches us to lay up, or lay out, for ourselves, and according to our own fancies; God teaches us to be willing to communicate to the necessities and to the comfort of others, and so as to do good to all about us according to our ability. The grace of God is contrary to the spirit of the world, and therefore the friendship of the world is to be avoided, if we pretend to be friends of God. Yea, the grace of God will correct and cure the spirit that naturally dwells in us. Where he giveth grace he giveth another spirit than that of the world.

Thirdly. We are taught to observe the difference God makes betwixt pride and humility; ver. 6. "God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble." This is represented as the language of Scripture in the Old Testament. For so it is declared in the book of Psalms, that God "will save the afflicted people," (if their spirits be suited to their condition,) "but will bring down high looks," Psa. xlii. 7. And in the book of Proverbs it is said, "He scorneth the scornors, and giveth grace unto the lowly," Prov. iii. 34. Two things are here to be observed, 1. The disgrace cast upon the proud. God resists them; the original word, avresaserai, signifies God setting himself as in battle array against them. And can there be a greater disgrace than for God to proclaim a man a rebel, an enemy, a traitor to his crown and dignity, and to proceed against him as such? The proud resisteth God. In his understanding he resisteth the truths of God, in his will he resisteth the laws of God, in his passions he resisteth the providence of God, and therefore no wonder that God sets himself against the proud. Let proud spirits hear this and tremble; God resists them. Who can describe the wretched state of those that make God their enemy? He will certainly fill the faces of such with shame, sooner or later, as have filled their hearts with pride. We should therefore resist pride in our hearts, if we would not have God to resist us.

2. Observe the honour and help God gives to the humble. Grace, as opposed to disgrace, is honour; this God gives to the humble. And where God gives grace to the humble, there he will give all other graces; and, as in the beginning of this sixth verse, he will give more grace. Wherever God gives true grace, he will give more. For to him that hath, and useth what he hath aright, more shall be given. He will especially give more grace to the humble, because they see their need of it, will pray for it, and be thankful for it, and such shall have it. For this reason, Fourthly. We are taught to submit ourselves entirely to God: ver. 7, "Submit yourselves therefore to God: resist the devil and he will flee from you." Christians should forsake the friendship of the world, and watch against that envy and pride which they see prevailing in natural men, and should, by grace, learn to glory in their submissions to God. "Submit yourselves" to him as subjects to their prince in duty, and as one friend to another in love and interest. Submit your understandings to the truths of God, submit your wills to the will of God, the will of his precept, the will of his providence. We are subjects, and as such must be submissive, not only through fear, but through love; not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake. Submit yourselves to God, as considering how many ways you are bound to this, and as considering what advantage you will gain by it. For God will not hurt you by his dominion over you, but will do you good. Now, as this subjection and submission to God is what the devil most industriously strives to hinder, so we ought with great care and steadiness to resist his suggestions. If he would represent a tame yielding to the will and providence of God as what will bring calamities, and expose to contempt and misery, we must resist those suggestions of fear. If he would represent submission to God as a hindrance to our outward ease, or worldly preferments, we must resist these suggestions of pride and sloth. If he would tempt us to lay any of our miseries, and crosses, and afflictions to the charge of providence, so as that we might avoid them by following his directions instead of God's, we must resist these provocations to anger, not "fretting ourselves in anywise to do evil." Let not the devil, in these or the like attempts, prevail upon you; but resist him, and he will flee from you. If we basely yield to temptations, the devil will continually follow us; but if we put on the whole armour of God, and stand it out against him, he will be gone from us. Resolution shuts and bolts the door against temptation.

Fifthly. We are directed how to carry it towards God in our becoming submissive to him, ver. 8 and 10.

1. "Draw nigh to God." The heart that has rebelled must be brought to the foot of God; the spirit that was distant, and estranged from a life of communion and converse with God, must become acquainted with him. Draw nigh to God in his worship and institutions, and in every duty he requires of you.

2. "Cleanse your hands." He that comes unto God must have clean hands. St. Paul therefore directs to "lift up holy hands without wrath and doubting," 1 Tim. ii. 8; hands free from blood, and bribes, and every thing that is unjust or cruel, and free from every defilement of sin. He is not subject to God who is a servant of sin. The hands must be cleansed by faith, repentance, and reformation, or it will be in vain for us to draw nigh to God in prayer, or in any of the exercises of devotion.

3. The hearts of the world are here meant by "the double-minded." To purify the heart is to be sincere, and to act upon this single aim and principle, rather to please God than to seek after any thing in this world. Hypocrisy is heart impurity; but they who submit themselves to God aright will purify their hearts as well as cleanse their hands.

4. "Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep." What afflictions God sends, take them as he would have you, and be duly sensible of them. "Be afflicted" when afflictions are sent upon you, and do not despise them. Or, "be afflicted" in your sympathies with those that are so, and in laying to heart the calamities of the whom he has united to himself, and will not suffer them to be friends with his enemies—to forsake him for them. "The apostle is speaking of the eager and jealous love of God towards those whom he has united, as it were, in a bond of marriage with himself."

iv. 10. Conclusion of the exhortation arising from the knowledge of God's jealous love for his people. Submit, draw near to him; humble yourselves, and he shall exalt you.

iv. 11, 12. The apostle proceeds to show that evil-speaking arises church of God. "Mourn and weep" for your own sins, and the sins of others. Times of contention and division are times to mourn in; and the sins that occasion wars and fightings should be mourned for. "Let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness." This may be taken either as a prediction of sorrow or a prescription of seriousness. Let men think to set grief at defiance, yet God can bring it upon them. None laugh so heartily but he can turn their laughter into mourning. And this the unconcerned Christians St. James wrote to are threatened should be their case. They are therefore directed, before things come to the worst, to lay aside their vain mirth, and their sensual pleasures, that they might indulge in godly sorrow and penitential tears.

5. "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord." Let the inward acts of the soul be suitable to all those outward expressions of grief, affliction, and sorrow before mentioned. Humility of spirit is here required, as in the sight of him who looks principally at the spirits of men. Let there be thorough humiliation in a bewailing every thing that is evil; let there be great humility in doing that which is good. Humble yourselves.

Sixthly. We have great encouragement to carry it thus towards God. He will draw nigh to them that draw nigh to him, ver. 8; and he will lift up those that humble themselves in his sight, ver. 10. Those that draw nigh to God in a way of duty shall find God drawing nigh to them in a way of mercy. Draw nigh to him in faith, and trust, and obedience, and he will draw nigh to you for your deliverance. If there be not a close communion between God and us, it is our fault, and not his. He shall lift up the humble. Thus much our Lord himself declared, "He that shall humble himself shall be exalted," Mat. xxiii. 12. If we are truly penitent and humble under the marks of God's displeasure, we shall in a little time know the advantages of his favour. He will lift us up out of trouble, or he will lift us up in our spirits and comforts under trouble. He will lift us up to honour and safety in the world, or he will lift us up in our way to heaven, so as to raise our hearts and affections above the world. "God will revive the spirit of the humble," Isa. lvii. 15; and he "will hear the desire of the humble," Psa. x. 17; and he will at last lift them up to glory. Before honour is humility. The highest honour in heaven will be the reward of the greatest humility on earth.

11 Speak not evil one of another, brethren. He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. 12 There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy: who art thou that judgest another? 13 Go to now, ye that say, gain: 14 Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. 15 For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that. 16 But now ye rejoice in your boastings: all such rejoicing is evil. 17 Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

In this part of the chapter we are, First. Cautioned against the sin of evil speaking; ver. 11, "Speak not evil one of another, brethren." The Greek word καταλαλετε signifies speaking any thing that may hurt or injure another. We must not speak evil things of others, though they are true, unless we be called to it, and there be some necessary occasion for it. Much less must we report evil things when they are false, or, from the same cause as those fightings and lustings before reprobated—viz., self-exaltation (verse 6). "Judgeth the law:" i.e., pronounces upon its observance by others, and so sets himself up above both his brother and the law. "Such a one acts as though the law could not perform its own office of judging" (Bengel). "There is one lawgiver and judge" (so the best MSS.); he can and will judge and execute judgment. "It is not for us to judge, especially as we cannot carry out our judgment" (Bengel).

for aught we know, may be so. Our lips must be guided by the law of kindness, as well as truth and justice. This, which Solomon makes a necessary part of the character of his virtuous woman, that she "openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness," Pr. xxxi. 26, must needs be a part of the character of every true Christian. "Speak not evil one of another."

1. Because ye are "brethren." The compellation, as used by the apostle here, carries an argument along with it. Since Christians are brethren, they should not revile or defame one another. It is required of us that we be tender of the good name of our brethren. Where we cannot speak well, we had better say nothing than speak evil. We must not take pleasure in making known the faults of others, divulging things that are secret merely to expose them; nor in making more of their known faults than really they deserve; and least of all in making false stories, and spreading things concerning them of which they are altogether innocent. What is this but to raise the hatred and encourage the persecutions of the world against those who are engaged in the same interests with yourselves, and therefore with whom you yourselves must stand or fall? Consider, ye are brethren.

2. Speak not evil one of another, because this is to judge the law. "He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law." The law of Moses says, "Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people," Lev. xix. 16. The law of Christ is, "Judge not, that ye be not judged," Mat. vii. 1. The sum and substance of both is, that men should "love one another." A detracting tongue, therefore, condemns the law of God, and the commandment of Christ, when it is defaming its neighbour. To break God's commandments is, in effect, to speak evil of them, and to judge them, as if they were too strict, and laid too great a restraint upon us. The Christians to whom St. James wrote were apt to speak very hard and ill things of one another, because of their differences about indifferent things, (such as the observance of meats and days, as appears from Rom. xiv.) Now, says the apostle, he that censures and condemns his brother for not agreeing with him in those things which the law of God has left indifferent, thereby censures and condemns the law as if it had done him in leaving them indifferent. He that quarrels with his brother, and condemns him for the sake of any thing not determined in the word of God, does thereby reflect on that word of God as if it were not a perfect rule. Let us take heed of judging the law, for the law of the Lord is perfect. If men break the law, leave that to judge them; if they do not break it, let not us judge them. This is a heinous evil, because it is to forget our place, that we ought to be doers of the law; and it is to set up ourselves above it, as if we were to be judges of it. He that is guilty of the sin here cautioned against is "not a doer of the law, but a judge." He assumes an office and place that does not belong to him, and he will be sure to suffer for it in the end. Those that are most ready to set up for judges of the law generally fail most in their obedience to it.

3. Speak not evil one of another, because God the lawgiver has reserved the power of passing the final sentence on men wholly to himself; ver. 12. "There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy. Who art thou that judgest another?" Princes and states are not excluded by what is here said from making laws, nor are subjects at all encouraged to disobey human laws; but God is still to be acknowledged as the supreme lawgiver, who only can give law to the conscience, and who alone is to be absolutely obeyed. His right to enact laws is incontestable, because he has such power to enforce them. He "is able to save and to destroy" so as none other can. He has power fully to reward the observance of his laws, and to punish all disobedience. He can save the soul, and make it happy for ever; or he can, after he has killed, cast into hell, and therefore should be feared and obeyed as the great lawgiver, and all judgment should be committed to him. Since there is one lawgiver, we may infer that it is not for any man, or company of men in the world, to pretend to give laws immediately to bind conscience; for that is God's prerogative, which must not be invaded. As the apostle had before warned against being many masters, so here he cautions against being many judges. Let us not prescribe to our brethren, let us not censure and condemn them. It is sufficient that we have the law of God, which is a rule to us all, and therefore we should not set up other rules. Let us not presume to set up our own particular notions and opinions as a rule to all about us. "There is one lawgiver," &c.

Secondly, we are cautioned against a presumptuous confidence of the continuance of our lives, and against forming projects thereupon with assurance of success, ver. 13, 14. The apostle having reproved those who were judges and condemners of the law, now reproves such as were disregarding of providence. "Go to, now." An old way of speaking, designed to engage attention. The Greek word may be rendered, 'Behold, now!' or 'See, and consider!' Ye that say, "To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy, and sell, and get gain;" reflect a little on this way of thinking and talking; call yourselves to account for it. Serious reflection on our words and ways would shew us many evils that we are apt through inadvertency to run into, and continue in. There were some that said of old, as too many say still, "We will go to such a city," and do this or that for such a term of time, whilst all serious regards to the disposals of providence were neglected. Observe here,

1. How apt worldly and projecting men are to leave God out of their schemes. Where any are set upon earthly things, these have a strange power of engrossing the thoughts and the heart. We should therefore have a care of growing intent or eager in our pursuits after any thing here below.

2. How much of a worldly happiness lies in the promises men make to themselves beforehand. Their heads are full of fine visions as to what they shall do, and be, and enjoy, in some future time, when they can neither be sure of time, nor of any of the advantages they promise themselves. Therefore observe,

3. How vain a thing it is to look for any thing good in futurity, without the concurrence of Providence. "We will go to such a city," say they, perhaps to Antioch, or Damascus, or Alexandria, which were then the great places for traffic. But how could they be sure when they set out that they should reach any of these cities? Something might possibly stop their way, or call them elsewhere, or cut the thread of life. Many that have set out on a journey have gone to their long home, and never reached their journey's end. But suppose they should reach the city they designed, how did they know they should continue there? Something might happen to send them back, or to call them from hence, and to shorten their stay. Or suppose they should stay the full time they proposed, yet they could not be certain that they should buy and sell there. Perhaps they might lie sick there, or they might not meet with those to trade with whom they expected. Yea, suppose they should go to that city, and "continue there a year," and should "buy and sell," yet they might not "get gain." Getting of gain in this world is at best but an uncertain thing; and they might probably make more losing bargains than gainful ones. And then, as to all these particulars, the frailty, and shortness, and uncertainty of life, ought to check the vanity and presumptuous confidence of such projectors for futurity; ver. 14. "What is your life? It is even a vapour, that appeareth for a little time and then vanisheth away." God hath wisely left us in the dark concerning future events, and even concerning the duration of life itself. "We know not what shall be on the morrow." We may know what we intend to do, and to be, but a thousand things may happen to prevent us. We are not sure of life itself, since it is but as "a vapour;" something in appearance, but nothing solid or certain; easily scattered and gone. We can fix the hour and minute of the sun's rising and setting to-morrow, but we cannot fix the certain time of a vapour's being scattered; such is our life; "It appears but for a little time, and then vanisheth away." It vanisheth as to this world, but there is a life that will continue in the other world; and, since this life is so uncertain, it concerns us all to prepare and lay up in store for that to come.

Thirdly, We are taught to keep up a constant sense of our dependence on the will of God for life, and all the actions and enjoyments of it; "Ye ought to say, If the Lord will we shall live, and do this or that," ver. 15. The apostle, having reproved them for what was amiss, now directs them how to be and do better: "Ye ought to say it in your hearts at all times, and with your tongues upon proper occasions, especially in your constant prayers and devotions, that if the Lord will give leave, and if he will own and bless you, that you have such and such designs to accomplish. This must be said, not in a slight, and formal, and customary way, but so as to think what we say, and so as to be reverent and serious in what we say. It is good to express ourselves thus when we have to do with others, but it is indispensably requisite that we should say this to ourselves in all that we go about. Σὺν ὁρῶν," with the leave and blessing of God, was used by the Greeks in the beginning of every undertaking.

1. "If the Lord will, we shall live." We must remember that our times are not in our own hands, but at the disposal of God. We live as long as God appoints, and in the circumstances God appoints, and therefore must be submissive to him, even as to life itself; and then,

2. "If the Lord will, we shall do this or that." All our actions and designs are under the control of heaven. Our heads may be filled with cares and contrivances; this and the other thing we may propose to do for ourselves, or our families, or our friends; but providence sometimes breaks all our measures, and throws our schemes into confusion. Therefore both our counsels for action and our conduct in action should be entirely referred to God; all we design and all we do should be with a submissive dependence on God.

Fourthly, We are directed to avoid vain boasting, and to look upon it not only as a weak, but a very evil thing; "Ye rejoice in your boastings; all such rejoicing is evil," ver. 16. They promised themselves life and prosperity, and great things in the world, without any just regards to God; and then they boasted of these things. Such is the joy of worldly people, to boast of all their successes, yea, many times to boast of their very projects before they know what success they shall have. How common is it for men to boast of things which they have no other title to but what arises from their own vanity and presumption! "Such rejoicing," says the apostle, "is evil;" it is foolish and it is hurtful. For men to boast of worldly things, and of their aspiring projects, when they should be attending to the humbling duties before laid down in ver. 8—10, is a very ill thing. It is a great sin in God's account; it will bring great disappointments upon themselves, and it will prove their destruction in the end. If we rejoice in God that our times are in his hand, that all events are at his disposal, and that he is our God in covenant, this rejoicing is good; the wisdom, power, and providence of God are then concerned to make all things work together for our good. But if we rejoice in our own vain confidences and presumptuous boasts, this is evil; it is an evil carefully to be avoided by all wise and good men.

Fifthly, We are taught, in the whole of our conduct, to act up to our own convictions; and whether we have to do with God or men, to see that we never go contrary to our own knowledge; ver. 17. "To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." It is aggravated sin, it is sinning with a witness; and it is to have the worst witness against a man that can be, when he sins against his own conscience. Observe,

1. This stands immediately connected with the plain lesson of saying, "If the Lord will, we shall do this or that." They might be ready to say, "This is a very obvious thing; who knows not that we all depend upon Almighty God for life, and breath, and all things? Remember, then, if you do know this, that whenever you carry it unsuitably to such a dependence, 'to him that knoweth to do good, and does it not, to him it is sin,' the greater sin." Observe again,

2. Omissions are sins that will come into judgment, as well as commissions. He that does not the good he knows should be done, as well as he who does the evil he knows should not be done, will be condemned. Let us, therefore, take care that conscience be rightly informed, and then that it be faithfully and constantly obeyed; for, if "our own hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God;" but if we say, "We see," and do not act suitably to our sight, then our "sin remaineth," Jno. ix. 41.

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter the apostle denounces the judgments of God upon those rich men that oppress the poor; shewing them how great their sin and folly is in the sight of God; and how grievous the punishments would be which should fall upon themselves, ver. 1—6. Hereupon all the faithful are exhorted to patience under their trials and sufferings, ver. 7—11; the sin of swearing is cautioned against, ver. 12; we are directed how to carry it both under affliction and in prosperity, ver. 13; prayer for the sick, and anointing with oil, are prescribed, ver. 14, 15; Christians are directed to acknowledge their faults one to another, and to pray one for another, and the efficacy of prayer is proved, ver. 16—18. And lastly, it is recommended to us to do what we can for the reducing of them that stray from the ways of truth, ver. 19, 20.

O to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. 2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. 3 Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire.

Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days. 4 Behold, the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are

iv. 14. Not as in Authorised Version, according to MSS., but "For what is your life? for ye are a vapour, &c.," as if the apostle would add force to his depreciation of their pride: "Ye yourselves are only a vapour; your life is certainly not more enduring."

iv. 17. The general principle that the last example illustrated is here stated—viz., that knowledge without practice is imputed to men as sin.

v. 3. "The rust of them shall be a witness against you:" rust does not happen to gold and silver; but these are here used generally to denote wealth. The apostle seems to intend a warning against three evil courses connected with riches: hoarding (verses 2, 3), defrauding to obtain riches (verse 4), wasting in riotous living (verse 5).

v. 4. This is the only passage in the New Testament where "the Lord of Sabaoth"—i.e., "of hosts"—is used. The Jewish character of the epistle accounts for this; Rom. ix. 29 is a quotation.

entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth. 5 Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts, as in a day of slaughter. 6 Ye have condemned and killed the just; and he doth not resist you. 7 Be patient therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain. 8 Be ye also patient; stablish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. 9 Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the judge standeth before the door. 10 Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience. 11 Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

The apostle is here addressing first sinners, and then saints.

First, Let us consider the address to sinners; and here we find St. James seconding what his great Master had said, "Woe unto you that are rich, for ye have received your consolation," Lu. vi. 24. The rich people, to whom this word of warning was sent, were not such as professed the Christian religion, but the worldly and unbelieving Jews, such as are here said to condemn and kill the just, which the Christians had no power to do; and though this epistle was written for the sake of the faithful, and was sent principally to them, yet, by an apostrophe, the infidel Jews may be well supposed here spoken to. They would not hear the word, and therefore it is written, that they might read it. It is observable, in the inscription of this epistle, that it is not directed, as Paul's epistles were, "to the brethren in Christ," but, in general, "to the twelve tribes;" and the salutation is not, "grace and peace from Christ," but, in general, "greeting," ch. i. 1. The poor among the Jews received the Gospel, and many of them believed; but the generality of the rich rejected Christianity, and were hardened in their unbelief, and hated and persecuted those who believed on Christ. To these oppressing, unbelieving, persecuting, rich people, the apostle directs himself in the first six verses.

1. He foretells the judgments of God that should come upon them, ver. 1-3. They should have miseries come upon them, and such dreadful miseries that the very apprehension of them was enough to make them weep and howl—misery that should arise from the very things in which they placed their happiness, and misery that should be completed by these things witnessing against them at the last, to their utter destruction; and they are now called to reason upon and thoroughly to weigh the matter, and to think how they will stand before God in judgment; "Go to now, ye rich men."

1st. You may be assured of this, that very dreadful calamities are coming upon you, calamities that shall carry nothing of support nor comfort in them, but all misery, misery in time, misery to eternity, misery in your outward afflictions, misery in your inward frame and temper of mind, misery in this world, misery in hell. You have not a single instance of misery only coming upon you, but miseries. The ruin of your church and nation is at hand; and there will come a day of wrath, when riches shall not profit men, but all the wicked shall be destroyed.

2nd. The very apprehension of such miseries as were coming upon them is enough to make them weep and howl. Rich men are apt to say to themselves, and others are ready to say to them, "Eat, drink, and be merry;" but God says, "Weep and howl!" It is not said, Weep and repent, for this the apostle does not expect from them, (he speaks in a way of denouncing rather than admonishing); but, "Weep and howl," for when your doom comes there will be nothing but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Those who live like beasts are called to howl like such. Public calamities are most grievous to rich people, who live in pleasure, and are secure and sensual; and therefore they shall weep and howl more than other people, for the miseries that shall come upon them.

["Miseries," &c. It is highly probable that the apostle here refers to those tremendous judgments which our Lord predicted were about to come upon Jerusalem and the Jewish people, and which were inflicted soon after this epistle was written. All the hoarded treasures of the rich would be worse than useless to them in that day of rebuke. "The enumeration of the various kinds of wealth," says Bishop Jebb, "is a poetical amplification, containing also a climax. Three kinds of wealth are intended: 1. Stores of corn, wine, oil, &c., liable to putrefaction; 2. Wardrobes of rich garments, among the ancients a chief part of their riches, and proverbially the prey of the moth; 3. Treasures of gold and silver, liable to rust, or at least to change colour. The rust or tarnishing of the precious metals rising as a witness against avaricious hoarders, is a noble figure; and the terror is greatly heightened when it is described as a fire eating their very vitals.]

3rd. Their misery shall arise from the very things in which they placed their happiness. Corruption, decay, rust, and ruin, will come upon all your goodly things; ver. 2, "Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten." These things, which you now inordinately affect, will hereafter insupportably wound you. They will be of no worth, of no use to you, but, on the contrary, they will pierce you through with many sorrows.

For, 4th. "They will witness against you, and they will eat your flesh, as it were fire," ver. 3. Things inanimate are frequently represented in Scripture as witnessing against wicked men. Heaven, earth, the stones of the field, the productions of the ground, and here the very rust and canker of ill-gotten and ill-kept treasures, are said to witness against impious rich men. They think to heap up treasure for their last days, to live plentifully upon them when they come to be old; but, alas! they are only heaping up treasures to become a prey to others, (as the Jews had all taken from them by the Romans,) and treasures that will prove at last to be only treasures of wrath, in "the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God." Then shall their iniquities, in the punishment of them, eat their flesh as it were fire. In the ruin of Jerusalem, many thousands perished by fire. In the last judgment the wicked shall be condemned to "everlasting burnings, prepared for the devil and his angels." The Lord deliver us from the portion of wicked rich men! And in order to this, let us take care that we do not fall into their sins, which we are next to consider.

2. The apostle shews what those sins are which should bring such miseries. To be in so deplorable a condition must doubtless be owing to some very heinous crimes.

1st. Covetousness is laid to the charge of this people. They laid by their garments till they bred moths, and were eaten. They hoarded up their gold and silver till they were rusty and cankered. It is a very great disgrace to these things that they carry in them the principles of their own corruption and consumption; the garment breeds the moth that frets it; the gold and silver breeds the canker that eats it. But the disgrace falls most heavily upon those who hoard and lay up these things till they come to be thus corrupted, and cankered, and eaten. God gives us our worldly possessions that we may honour him and do good with them; but if, instead of that, we sinfully hoard them up, through an undue affection toward them, or a distrust of the providence of God for the future, this is a very heinous crime, and will be witnessed against by the very rust and corruption of the treasure thus heaped together.

2nd. Another sin charged upon those against whom St. James writes, is oppression; ver. 4, "Behold the hire of the labourers, which have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth," &c.

Those that have wealth in their hands get power into their hands, and then they are tempted to abuse that power to oppress such as are under them. The rich we here find employing the poor in their labours; and the rich have as much need of the labours of the poor as the poor have of wages from the rich, and could as ill be without them; but yet, not considering this, they kept back the hire of the labourers. Having power in their hands, it is probable they made as hard bargains with the poor as they could; and even after that would not make good their bargain, as they should have done. This is a crying sin, an iniquity that cries so as to reach the ears of God. And in this case God is to be considered as "the Lord of sabaoth," or "the Lord of hosts,"

Κυριος σαβαωθ,—a phrase often used in the Old Testament when the people of God were defenceless, and wanted protection, and when their enemies were numerous and powerful. The Lord of hosts, who has all ranks of beings and creatures at his disposal, and who sets all in their several places, he hears the oppressed when they cry by reason of the cruelty or injustice of the oppressor, and he will give orders to some of those hosts that are under him, (angels, devils, storms, distempers, or the like,) to avenge the wrongs done to those who are dealt with unrighteously and unmercifully. Take heed of this sin of defrauding and oppressing, and avoid the very appearances of it.

3rd. Another sin here mentioned is, sensuality and voluptuousness; ver. 5, "Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton," &c. God does not forbid us to use pleasures; but to live in them as if we lived for nothing else is a very provoking sin; and to do this on the earth, where we are but strangers and pilgrims, where we are to continue but for awhile, and where we ought to be preparing for eternity, this, this is a grievous aggravation of the sin of voluptuousness. Luxury makes people wanton, as in Hos. xiii. 6, "According to their pasture so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me." Wantonness and luxury are commonly the effects of great plenty and abundance. It is hard for people to have great estates and not too much indulge themselves in carnal, sensual pleasures; "Ye have nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter." Ye live as if it was every day a day of sacrifices, a festival; and hereby your hearts are fattened and nourished to stupidity, and dulness, and pride, and an insensibility of the wants and afflictions of others. Why, some may say, What harm is there in good cheer, provided people do not spend above what they have? What! is it no harm for people to make gods of their bellies, and to give all to these, instead of abounding in acts of charity and piety? Is it no harm for people to unfit themselves for minding the concerns of their souls, by indulging the appetites of their bodies? Surely that which brought flames upon Sodom, and would bring these miseries, for which rich men are here called to weep and howl, must be a heinous evil. Pride, and idleness, and fulness of bread, mean the same thing with living in pleasure, and being wanton, and nourishing the heart as in a day of slaughter.

4th. Another sin here charged on the rich was persecution; ver. 6, "Ye have condemned and killed the just, and he doth not resist you." This fills up the measure of their iniquity. They oppressed and acted very unjustly to get estates; when they had them they gave way to luxury and sensuality till they had lost all sense and feeling of others' wants or afflictions, and then they persecute and kill without remorse. They pretend to act legally, indeed; they condemn before they kill. But unjust persecutions, whatever colour of law they may carry in them, will come into the reckoning when God shall make inquisition for blood, as well as massacres and downright murders. Observe here, that the just may be condemned and killed. But then again observe, that when such do suffer, and without resistance yield to the unjust sentence of oppressors, that this is marked by God to the honour of the sufferers and the infamy of their persecutors. This commonly shews that judgments are at the door; and we may certainly conclude that a reckoning day will come to reward the piety of the oppressed and to break to pieces the oppressor. Thus far the address to sinners goes.

Secondly. We have next subjoined an address to saints. Some have been ready to despise or to condemn this way of preaching, when ministers in their application have brought a word to sinners and a word to saints; but from the apostle's here taking this method we may conclude that this is the best way rightly to divide the word of truth. From what has been said concerning wicked and oppressing rich men, occasion is given to administer comfort to God's afflicted people. Be patient, therefore, since God will send such miseries on the wicked. You may see what is your duty, and where your greatest encouragement lies.

1. Attend to your duty. "Be patient," ver. 7; "Stablish your hearts," ver. 8; "Grudge not one against another, brethren," ver. 9. Consider well the meaning of these three expressions.

1st. "Be patient." Bear your afflictions without murmuring, your injuries without revenge; and though God should not in any signal manner appear for you immediately, wait for him. "The vision is for an appointed time; at the end it will speak, and will not lie: therefore wait for it. It is but a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry." Let your patience be lengthened out to long-suffering, as the word here used, μακροθυμια, signifies. When we have done our work we have need of patience to stay for our reward. This Christian patience is not a mere yielding to necessity, as the moral patience taught by some philosophers was; but it is a humble acquiescing in the wisdom and will of God, with an eye to a future glorious recompence; "Be patient

v. 7—11. Suffering believers must patiently wait for the Lord's coming, who will exalt them and reward their trustful patience.

v. 12. "Swear not," through impatience to which trials may tempt you.

v. 15. "Shall save the sick;" i.e., from his sickness. "And if he have," &c.: i.e., if he is suffering on account of certain sins com-

v. 5. "As" is omitted by best MSS. "In a day of slaughter:" i.e., instead of preparing for the future, they had lived careless of death, which must soon come. "They are like flocks which, up to the very day of slaughter, feed themselves and feast, joyful and careless" (Theile).

v. 6. "He doth not resist you:" "This last clause serves as a note of transition to what follows" (Alford). "Thus we have standing before us the slain and unresisting righteous man, when, lo!

to the coming of the Lord." And because this is a lesson Christians must learn, though never so hard or difficult to them, it is repeated in the 8th verse, "Be ye also patient."

2nd. "Stablish your hearts." Let your faith be firm without wavering, your practice of what is good constant, and continued without tiring; and your resolutions for God and heaven fixed, in spite of all sufferings or temptations. The prosperity of the wicked and the affliction of the righteous have in all ages been a very great trial to the faith of the people of God. David tells us that "his feet were almost gone, when he saw the prosperity of the wicked." Ps. lxxiii. 2. And some of those Christians to whom St. James wrote might probably be in the same tottering condition, and therefore they are called upon to establish their hearts. Faith and patience will establish the heart.

3rd. "Grudge not one against another." These words signify, "Grieve not one against another," μη στυγέετε; that is, do not make one another uneasy by your murmuring groans at what befalls you, or by your distrustful groans as to what may farther come upon you, or by your revengeful groans against the instruments of your sufferings, or by your envious groans at those who may be free from your calamities. Do not make yourselves uneasy, and make one another uneasy, by thus groaning to and grieving one another. "The apostle seemeth to me," says Dr. Manton, "to be here taxing those mutual injuries and animosities wherewith the Christians of those times, having banded under the names of circumcision and uncircumcision, did grieve one another, and give each other cause to groan; so that they did not only sigh under the oppressions of the rich persecutors, but under the injuries which they sustained from many of the brethren, who, together with them, did profess the holy faith." Those who are in the midst of common enemies, and in any suffering circumstances, should be more especially careful not to grieve or to groan against one another, otherwise judgments will come upon them as well as others; and the more such grudgings prevail the nearer do they shew judgment to be.

2. Consider what encouragement here is for Christians to be patient, to establish their hearts, and not to grudge one against another. And,

1st. Look to the example of the husbandman. He "waits for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter rain." When you sow your corn in the ground, you wait many months for the former and latter rain, and are willing to stay till harvest for the fruit of your labour; and shall not this teach you to bear a few storms, and to be patient for a season, when you are looking for a kingdom, and everlasting felicity? Consider him that waits for a crop of corn, and will not you wait for a crown of glory? If you should be called to wait a little longer than the husbandman does, is it not something proportionably greater, and infinitely more worth your waiting for? But,

2nd. Think how short your waiting time may possibly be; ver. 8, "The coming of the Lord draweth nigh," and ver. 9, "Behold the Judge standeth before the door." Do not be impatient, do not quarrel with one another; the great Judge, who will set all to rights, who will punish the wicked and reward the good, is at hand. He should be conceived by you to stand as near as one that is just knocking at the door. The coming of the Lord to punish the wicked Jews was then very nigh, when St. James wrote this epistle. And whenever the patience and other graces of his people are tried in an extraordinary manner, the certainty of Christ's coming as Judge, and the nearness of it, should establish their hearts. The Judge is now a great deal nearer in his coming to judge the world than when this epistle was written; nearer by one thousand seven hundred [one thousand eight hundred] years almost; and therefore this should have the greater effect upon us. [Christ's second coming is an argument for walking in all holy conversation, of which all the apostles, in all their epistles, make great use. The believer should have it constantly before him, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God.]

3rd. The danger of our being condemned when the Judge appears should excite us to mind our duty as before laid down. "Grudge not, lest ye be condemned." Fretfulness and discontent expose us to the just judgment of God, and we bring more calamities upon ourselves by our murmuring, distrustful, envious groans, and grudgings against one another, than we are aware of. If we avoid these evils, and be patient under our trials, God will not condemn us. Let us encourage ourselves with this.

4th. We are encouraged to be patient, by the example of the prophets; ver. 10, "Take the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction and of patience." Observe here, that the prophets, on whom God put the greatest honour, and for whom he had the greatest favour, yet were most afflicted. And when we think that the best men have had the hardest usage in this world, we should hereby be reconciled to affliction. Observe farther, that those who were the greatest examples of suffering affliction are also the best and greatest examples of patience. Tribulation worketh patience. Hereupon St. James gives it us as the common sense of the faithful; ver. 11, "We count them happy which endure." We look upon righteous and patient sufferers as the happiest people: see ch. i. 2-12.

5th. Job also is proposed as an example, for the encouragement of the afflicted; ver. 11, "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord," &c. In the case of Job you have an instance of a variety of miseries, and of such as were very grievous; but under all he could bless God, and as to the general bent of his spirit he was patient and humble. And what came to him in the end? Why, truly God accomplished and brought about those things for him that plainly prove "the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy." The best way to bear afflictions is to look to the end of them; and the pity of God is such that he will not delay the bringing them to an end, when his purposes are once answered; and the tender mercy of God is such, that he will make his people an abundant amends for all their sufferings and afflictions. His bowels are moved for them whilst suffering, his bounty is manifested afterward. Let us serve our God, and endure our trials, as those that believe; the end will crown all.

12 But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath: but let your yea be yea; and your nay, nay; lest ye fall into condemnation. 13 Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms. 14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord: 15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up:

mitted by him, these shall be forgiven him, as well as his sickness be healed. The application of this whole passage, or any part of it, to the rite of extreme unction is, as Cardinal Cajetan admits, impossible. Extreme unction is administered to the actually dying, to save the soul; St. James's unction was to heal the body, when accompanied by faithful prayer.

v. 16. "Confess your faults one to another:" here there is no sanction given to auricular or sacramental confession. As Cajetan and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. 16 Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that he may be healed. The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much. 17 Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain: and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. 18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit. 19 Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him; 20 Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins.

First. The sin of swearing is cautioned against; ver. 12, "But above all things, my brethren, swear not," &c. Some understand this too strictly, as if the meaning was, "Swear not at your persecutors," at those that reproach you, and say all manner of evil of you; be not put into a passion by the injuries they do you, so as in your passion to be provoked to swear." This swearing is no doubt forbidden here; and it will not excuse those that are guilty of this sin, to say they swear only when they are provoked to it, and before they are aware. But the apostle's warning extends to other occasions of swearing as well as this. Some have translated the words, πρὸ πάντων,—"before all things;" and so have made the sense of this place to be, that they should not in common conversation, before every thing they say, put an oath. All customary, needless swearing is undoubtedly forbidden, and all along in Scripture condemned as a very grievous sin. Profane swearing was very customary among the Jews; and since this epistle is directed in general to "the twelve tribes scattered abroad," (as before has been observed,) we may conceive this exhortation sent to those who believed not. It is hard to suppose that swearing should be one of the spots of God's children; since Peter, when he was charged with being a disciple of Christ, and would disprove the charge, cursed and swore, thereby thinking most effectually to convince them that he was no disciple of Jesus, it being well known of such, that they durst not allow themselves in swearing. But possibly some of the looser sort of them that were called Christians might, amongst other sins here charged upon them, be guilty also of this. And it is a sin that in later years has most scandalously prevailed, even amongst those that would be thought above all others entitled to the Christian name and privileges. It is very rare indeed to hear of a dissenter from the Church of England who is guilty of swearing; but amongst those who glory in their being of the established church nothing more common; and indeed, the most execrable oaths and curses now daily wound the ears and hearts of all serious Christians. [So the original commentators. It is hoped that there is now less swearing even among members of the established church. But whether in or out of the establishment, all require to take heed to the exhortation which follows.] St. James here says, "above all things swear not;" but how many are there that mind this the least of all things, and that make light of nothing so much as common profane swearing! But why, "above all things," is swearing here forbidden? Because it strikes most directly at the honour of God, and most expressly throws contempt upon his name and authority. Because this sin has, of all others, the least temptation to it; it is neither gain, nor pleasure, nor reputation, that can move men to it, but a wantonness in sinning, and a needless shewing an enmity to God. "Thine enemies take thy name in vain," Ps. cxxxix. 20. This is a proof of men's being enemies to God, however they may pretend to call themselves by his name, or sometimes to compliment him in acts of worship. Because it is a sin that is most hardly left off when once men are accustomed to it, therefore it should, above all others, be watched against. And, once more, "above all things swear not;" for how can you expect the name of God should be a strong tower to you in your distress if you profane it, and play with it at other times? But (as Mr. Baxter observes) "All this is so far from forbidding necessary oaths, that it is but to confirm them, by preserving the due reverence of them." And then he farther notes, "That the true nature of an oath is, by our speech, to pawn the reputation of some certain or great thing, for the averring of a doubted lesser thing; and not (as is commonly held) an appeal to God, or other judge." Hence it was that swearing by the heavens, and by the earth, and by the other oaths the apostle refers to, came to be in use. The Jews thought, if they did but omit the great oath of "Chi Elohah," they were safe. But they grew so profane as to swear by the creature as if it was God; and so advanced it into the place of God. While, on the other hand, they that swear commonly and profanely by the name of God do hereby put him upon the level with every common thing. "But let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay; lest you fall into condemnation;" that is, let it suffice you to affirm or deny a thing, as there is occasion; and be sure to stand to your word, and be true to it, so as to give no occasion for your being suspected of falsehood; and then you will be kept from the condemnation of backing what you say or promise by rash oaths, and from profaning the name of God to justify yourselves. It is being suspected of falsehood that leads men to swearing. Let it be known that you keep to truth, and are firm to your word, and by this means you will find there is no need to swear to what you say. Thus shall you escape the condemnation which is expressly annexed to the third commandment; "The Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain." [The Christian, above all others, should be one upon whose simple word the utmost reliance can be placed; his yea should be yea, and his nay, nay; that is, what he affirms should be true, what he denies false.]

Secondly. As Christians we are taught to suit ourselves to the dispensations of Providence; ver. 13, "Is any among you afflicted? let him pray. Is any merry? let him sing psalms." Our condition in this world is various; and our wisdom is to submit to its being so, and to carry it as becomes us, both in prosperity and under affliction. Sometimes we are in sadness, sometimes in mirth; God has set these one over against the other, that we may the better observe the several duties he enjoins, and that the impressions made on our passions and affections may be rendered serviceable to our devotions. Afflictions should put us upon prayer, and prosperity should make us abound in praise. Not again admits, "this passage is not concerning sacramental confession."

v. 17. "Prayed earnestly:" literally, "prayed with prayer," an Hebraism, signifying continuance in or intensity of prayer.

v. 19. Not "do err," as Authorised Version, but "be seduced." The word is passive.

v. 20. "Shall hide a multitude of sins:" not his own, but those of the one he converts. Prov. x. 12 refers to charity covering the that prayer is to be confined to a time of trouble, or singing to a time of mirth; but these several duties may be performed with special advantage, and to the happiest purposes, at such seasons.

1. In a day of affliction nothing more seasonable than prayer. The person afflicted must pray himself, as well as engage the prayers of others for him. Times of affliction should be praying times. To this end God sends afflictions, that we may be engaged to seek him early, and that those who at other times have neglected him may be brought to inquire after him. The spirit is then most humble, the heart is broken and tender; and prayer is most acceptable to God when it comes from a contrite, humble spirit. Afflictions naturally draw out complaints, and to whom should we complain but to God in prayer? It is necessary to exercise faith and hope under afflictions; and prayer is the appointed means both for obtaining and increasing these graces in us. "Is any afflicted? let him pray."

2. In a day of mirth and prosperity "singing psalms is very proper and seasonable." In the original it is only said, "sing," (ψαλλέτω), without the addition of psalms, or any other word. And we learn from the writings of several in the first ages of Christianity, particularly from a letter of Pliny's, and from some passages in Justin Martyr and Tertullian, that the Christians were used to sing hymns, either taken out of Scripture, or of more private composition, in their worship of God. Though some have thought that St. Paul's advising both the Colossians and Ephesians to "sing to one another," (ψάλλοντες ἀλλήλοις καὶ ψόδαις ψαλμοῖς καὶ ὕμνοις) "in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs," means only the compositions of Scripture, the Psalms of David being distinguished in the Hebrew by Shurim, Tehillim and Mizmorim, words that exactly answer these of the apostle. Let that be as it will, this however we are sure of, that singing psalms is a gospel ordinance, and that our joy should be holy joy, consecrated to God. Singing is so directed to here as to shew that if any be in circumstances of mirth and prosperity, he should turn his mirth, though alone, and by himself, into this channel. Holy mirth becomes families and retirements, as well as public assemblies. Let our singing be such as to "make melody with our hearts unto the Lord," and no doubt but God will be well pleased with this kind of devotion.

Thirdly. We have particular directions given as to sick persons; and healing, pardoning mercy promised, upon the observance of those directions.

1. If any be sick they are required to send for the elders, (πρεσβυτέρους τῆς ἐκκλησίας), the presbyters, pastors or ministers of the church, ver. 14. It lies upon sick people as a duty to send for ministers, and to desire their assistance and their prayers.

2. It is the duty of ministers to pray over the sick, when desired and called for. "Let them pray over him;" let their prayers be suited to his case, and their intercessions be as becomes those that are affected with his calamities.

3. In the times of miraculous healing the sick were to be "anointed with oil in the name of the Lord." Expositors generally confine this anointing with oil to such as had the power of working miracles; and when miracles ceased, this institution ceased also. In St. Mark's Gospel we read of the apostles "anointing with oil many that were sick, and healing them," Mar. vi. 13. And we have accounts of this being practised in the church two hundred years after Christ; but then the gift of healing also accompanied it; and when that miraculous gift ceased, this rite was laid aside. The papists, indeed, have made a sacrament of this, which they call the extreme unction. They use it not to heal the sick, as it was used by the apostles; but, as they generally run counter to Scripture in the appointments of their church, so here they ordain that this should be only administered to such as are at the very point of death. The apostle's anointing was in order to heal the disease; the popish anointing is for the expulsion of the relics of sin, and to enable the soul (as they pretend) the better to combat with the powers of the air. When this cannot prove by any visible effects that Christ owns them in the continuance of this rite, they would, however, have people to believe that the invisible effects are very wonderful. But it is surely much better to omit this anointing with oil than to turn it quite contrary to the purposes spoken of in Scripture. Some protestants have thought that this anointing was only permitted or approved by Christ, not instituted. But it should seem by the words of St. James here that it was a thing enjoined in cases where there was faith for healing. And some protestants have argued for it, with this view. It was not to be commonly used, not even in the apostolical age; and some have thought that it should not be wholly laid aside in any age; but where there are extraordinary measures of faith in the person anointing, and in those that are anointed, there may an extraordinary blessing attend the observance of this direction for the sick. However that be, there is one thing carefully to be directed here, that the saving of the sick is not ascribed to the anointing with oil, but to prayer; ver. 15 "The prayer of faith shall save the sick," &c. So that,

4. "Prayer over the sick must proceed from, and be accompanied with, a lively faith." There must be faith both in the person praying, and the person prayed for. In a time of sickness it is not the cold and formal prayer that is effectual, but the prayer of faith.

5. We should observe the success of prayer. "The Lord shall raise him up;" that is, if he be a person capable and fit for deliverance, and if God has any thing farther for such a person to do in the world. And "if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him;" that is, where sickness is sent as a punishment for some particular sin, that sin shall be pardoned; and, in token thereof, the sickness shall be removed. As when Christ said to the impotent man, "Go and sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee," it is intimated that some particular sin was the cause of his sickness. The great thing, therefore, we should beg of God for ourselves and others in the time of sickness, is the pardon of sin. Sin is both the root of sickness and the sting of it. If sin be pardoned, either affliction shall be removed in mercy, or we shall see there is mercy in the continuance of it. When healing is founded upon pardon, we may say as Hezekiah did, "Thou hast," in love to my soul, "delivered me from the pit of corruption," Isa. xxxviii. 17. When you are sick, and in pain, it is most common to pray and cry, "O give me ease! O restore me to health! But your prayer should rather chiefly be, O that God would pardon my sins!

Fourthly. Christians are directed to "confess their faults one to another," and so to join in their prayers with, and for, one another ver. 16. Some expositors connect this 16th verse with the 14th; as if when sick people send for ministers to pray over them, they should then confess their faults to them. Indeed, where any are conscious that their sickness is a vindictive punishment of some particular sin, and they cannot look for the removal of their sickness without particular applications to God for the pardon of such a sin, there it may be proper to acknowledge and tell his case, that those who pray over him may know how to plead rightly for him. But the confession here required is, that of Christians one to another; and not as the papists would have it, to a priest. Where persons have injured one another, acts of injustice must be confessed to those against whom they have been committed. Where persons have tempted one another to sin, or have consented in the same evil actions, there they ought mutually to blame themselves, and excite each other to repentance. Where crimes are of a public nature, and have done any public mischief, there they ought to be more publicly confessed, so as may best reach to all that are concerned. And sometimes it may be well to confess our faults to some prudent minister, or praying friend, that they may help us to plead with God for mercy and pardon. But then we are not to think St. James puts us upon telling every thing that we are conscious is amiss in ourselves, or in one another. But so far as confession is necessary to our reconciliation with such as are at variance with us, or for reparation of wrongs done to any, or for the gaining information in any point of conscience, and making our own spirits quiet and easy, so far we should be ready to confess our faults. And sometimes also it may be of good use to Christians to disclose their peculiar weaknesses and infirmities to one another, where there are great intimacies and friendships, and where they may help each other by their prayers to obtain pardon of their sins, and power against them. Those who make confession of their faults one to another, should thereupon pray with, and for, one another. The 13th verse directs persons to pray for themselves; "Is any afflicted? let him pray." The 14th verse directs to seek for the prayers of ministers. The 16th verse directs private Christians to pray for one another; so that here we have all sorts of prayer (ministerial, social, and secret) directed to.

Fifthly. The great advantage and efficacy of prayer is declared; and proved; "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," whether he pray for himself or for others: witness the example of Elias, ver. 17, 18. He that prays must be a righteous man, not righteous in an absolute sense, for this Elias was not, who is here made a pattern to us, but righteous in a gospel sense, not loving or approving of any known iniquity; "I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear my prayer," Ps. lxxvi. 18. Farther, the prayer itself must be a fervent, unwrought, well-wrought prayer; it must be a pouring out the heart to God, and it must proceed from a faith unfeigned. Such prayer avails much; it is of great advantage to ourselves; it may be very beneficial to our friends, and we are assured of its being acceptable to God. It is good having those for friends whose prayers are available in the sight of God. The power of prayer is here proved from the success of Elias. And this may be encouraging to us even in common cases, if we consider that Elias was a man of like passions with us. He was a zealous good man, and a very great man, but he had infirmities, and was subject to disorder in his passions as well as others. In prayer we must not look to the merit of man, but to the grace of God. Only in this we should copy after Elias, that "he prayed earnestly," or as it is in the original, "in prayer he prayed." It is not enough to say a prayer, but we must pray in prayer; our thoughts must be fixed, our desires firm and ardent, and our graces in exercise; and when we thus pray in prayer we shall speed in prayer. Elias prayed "that it might not rain," and God heard him in his pleading against an idolatrous, persecuting country, so that "it rained not on the earth, by the space of three years and six months. Again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain," &c. This you see prayer is the key which opens and shuts heaven. To this there is an allusion, Rev. xi. 6, where the two witnesses are said to "have power to shut heaven, that it rain not." This instance of the extraordinary efficacy of prayer is recorded for encouragement even to ordinary Christians to be instant and earnest in prayer. God never says to any of the seed of Jacob, "Seek my face in vain." If Elias by prayer could do such great and wonderful things, surely the prayers of no righteous man shall return void. Where there may be as much of grace.

Sixthly. This epistle concludes with an exhortation to do all we can in our places to further and promote the conversion and salvation of others, ver. 19, 20. Some interpret these verses as an apology which the apostle is making for himself, that he should so plainly and sharply reprove the Jewish Christians for their many faults and errors. And certainly St. James gives a very good reason why he was so much concerned to reclaim them from their errors; because in thus doing he should save souls, and "hide a multitude of sins." But we are not to restrain this place to the apostle's converting such as erred from the truth; no, nor to other ministerial endeavours of the like nature; since it is said, "If any err, and one convert him," let him be who he will that does so good an office for another, he is therein an instrument of "saving a soul from death." Those whom the apostle is here called to convert, he yet supposes liable to err. It is no mark of a wise or holy man to boast of his being free from error, or to refuse to acknowledge when he is in an error. But if any do err, be they never so great, you must not be afraid to shew them their error; and be they never so weak or little, you must not disdain to make them wiser and better. If they err from the truth, that is, from the Gospel, the great rule and standard of truth, whether it be in opinion or practice, you must endeavour to bring them again to the rule. Errors in judgment and in life generally go together. There is some habitually bad but it is upon some bad practical miscarriage. There is none habitually bad but it is upon some bad principle. Now to convert such is to reduce them from their error, and to reclaim them from the evils they have been led into. We are not presently to accuse and exclaim against an erring brother, and seek to bring reproach and calamities upon him, but to convert him. And if by all our endeavours we cannot do this, yet we are nowhere empowered to persecute and destroy him. If we are instrumental in the conversion of any, we are said to convert them, though this be principally and efficiently the work of God. And if we can do no more toward the conversion of sinners, yet we may do this, pray for the grace and Spirit of God to convert and change them. And let those that are any way serviceable to convert others know what will be the happy consequences of their doing this. They may take great comfort in it at present, and they will meet with a crown at last. He that is said to "err from the truth" in ver. 19, is described as erring in his way in ver. 20, and we cannot be said to convert any, merely by altering their opinions, unless we can bring them to correct and amend their ways. This is conversion, to turn a "sinner from the error of his ways," and not to turn him from one party to another, or merely from one notion and way of thinking to another. He that thus converteth a sinner from the error of his ways, "shall save a soul from death." There is a soul in the case, and what is done towards the salvation of that shall certainly turn to good account. The soul being the principal part of man, the saving of that only is mentioned, but it includes the salvation of the whole man. The spirit shall be saved from hell, and the body raised from the grave, and both saved from eternal death. And then by such conversion of heart and life a multitude of sins shall be hid. A most comfortable passage of Scripture this is. We learn from hence, that though our sins are many, even a multitude, yet they may be hid or pardoned; that when sin is turned from or forsaken it shall be hid, never to appear in judgment against us. And let people contrive to cover or excuse their sin as they will, there is no way effectually and finally to hide it but forsaking it. Some make the sense of this text to be, that conversion shall prevent a multitude of sins; and that is a truth beyond dispute, that many sins are prevented in the party converted; many also may be prevented in others that they may have an influence upon or may converse with. Upon the whole, how should we lay out ourselves with all possible concern for the conversion of sinners! It will be for the happiness and salvation of the converted; it will prevent much mischief, and the spreading and multiplying of sin in the world; it will be for the glory and honour of God; and it will mightily redound to our comfort and renown in the great day. "They that turn many to righteousness," and they that help to do so, "shall shine as the stars for ever and ever."

sins of others from men. This passage represents that one who converts another from error is the agent by whom that other's sins are hid from God—he becoming a believer.

Additional Notes.—Chap. i. 9–11. "But let the brother," &c.: i.e., the best safeguard against being "double-souled" is that Christian spirit by which the brother of low degree may rejoice in that he is exalted, by being accounted one of the brotherhood of Christ, his poverty and trials (2 Thess. i. 4, 5) for his Lord's sake being pledges to him of his future reward; while the rich may rejoice "in that he is made low," by being stripped of his riches for Christ's sake, or by trials which, making him lowly in mind, are in reality blessings.

i. 26, 27. Not "seem to be," but "thinketh himself." "Religion in its rise interests us about ourselves; in its progress, about our fellow-creatures; in its highest stage, about the honour of God" (Fausset).

EXPOSITION

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

Two epistles we have enrolled in the sacred canon of the Scripture, written by Peter, who was a most eminent apostle of Jesus Christ, and whose character shines bright, as it is described in the four Gospels, and in the Acts of the Apostles; but, as it is painted by the papists and legendary writers, it represents a person of extravagant pride and ambition. It is certain, from Scripture, that Simon Peter was one of the first of those whom our Lord called to be his disciples and followers; that he was a person of excellent endowments, both natural and gracious; of great parts and ready elocution; quick to apprehend and bold to execute whatever he knew to be his duty. When our Saviour called his apostles and gave them their commission, he nominated him first in the list; and, by his behaviour towards him, seems to distinguish him as a special favourite among the twelve. Many instances of our Lord's affection to him, both during his life and after his resurrection, are upon record. But there are many things confidently affirmed of this holy man that are directly false; as, that he had a primacy, and superior power over the rest of the apostles; that he was more than their equal; that he was their prince, monarch, and sovereign, and that he exercised jurisdiction over the whole college of the apostles. Moreover, that he was the sole universal pastor over all the Christian world; the only vicar of Christ upon earth; and that he was for above twenty years bishop of Rome; and that the popes of Rome succeed to St. Peter, and derive from him an universal supremacy and jurisdiction over all churches and Christians upon earth; and that all this was by our Lord's ordering and appointment. Whereas, Christ never gave him any pre-eminence of this kind, but positively forbade it, and gave precepts to the contrary. The other apostles never consented to any such claim: Paul declares himself "not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles," 2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11, "In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles." Here is no exception of St. Peter's superior dignity, whom St. Paul took the freedom to blame, and "withstood him to the face," Gal. ii. 11. And Peter himself never assumed anything like it, but modestly styles himself "an apostle of Jesus Christ;" and when he writes to the presbyters of the church, he humbly placeth himself in the same rank with them. "The elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder," ch. v. 1: see Dr. Barrow on the Pope's Supremacy. The design of this first epistle is, I. To explain more fully the doctrines of Christianity to these newly converted Jews. [See additional note, ch. i. 1.] II. To direct and persuade them to a holy conversation in the faithful discharge of all personal and relative duties, whereby they would secure their own peace, and effectually confute the slanders and reproaches of their enemies. III. To prepare them for sufferings. This seems to be his principal intention, for he has something to this purpose in every chapter, and doth by a great variety of arguments encourage them to patience and perseverance in the faith, lest the persecutions and sad calamities that were coming upon them should prevail with them to apostatize from Christ and the Gospel. It is remarkable that you find not so much as one word savouring of the spirit and pride of a pope in either of these epistles.

CHAPTER I.

In which the apostle describes the persons to whom he writes, and salutes them, ver. 1, 2; blesteth God for their regeneration to a lively hope of eternal salvation, 3—5; in the hope of which salvation he shews they had great cause of rejoicing, though for a little while they were in heaviness and affliction for the trial of their faith, which would produce joy unspeakable and full of glory, ver. 6—9. This is that salvation which the ancient prophets foretold, and the angels desire to look into, ver. 10—12. He exhorteth them to sobriety and holiness, which he presseth from the consideration of the blood of Jesus, the invaluable price of man's redemption, ver. 13—20; and to brotherly love, from the consideration of their regeneration, and the excellency of their spiritual state, ver. 21—25.

PETER, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, 2 Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: Grace unto you, and peace, be multiplied.

In this inscription we have three parts.

First. The author of it described,

1. By his name, "Peter." His first name was Simon, and Jesus Christ gave him the surname of Peter, which signifies 'a rock,' as a commendation of his faith, and to denote that he should be an eminent pillar in the church of God, Gal. ii. 9.

2. By his office: "An apostle of Jesus Christ." The word signifies 'one sent, a legate, a messenger, any one sent in Christ's name, and about his work; but more strictly it signifies the highest office in the Christian church; 1 Cor. xii. 28, "God hath set some in the church, first apostles." Their dignity and pre-eminence lay in these things. They were immediately chosen by Christ himself; they were first witnesses, then preachers of the resurrection of Christ, and so of the entire gospel dispensation. Their gifts were excellent and extraordinary; they had a power of working miracles, not at all times, but when Christ pleased; they were led into all truth, and were endowed with the spirit of prophecy, and they had an extent of power and jurisdiction beyond all others: every apostle was a universal bishop in all churches, and over all ministers. In this humble manner Peter, 1st. Asserts his own character as an apostle. Hence learn, that a man may lawfully acknowledge, and sometimes is bound to assert, the gifts and graces of God to him. To pretend to

ACROPOLIS OF AMASSIA.—VER. 1.

* By the Rev. Zech. Merrill. The additional notes (marked L. and B.) are from Archbishop Leighton's Commentary, and (by the kind permission of the author) from the Expository Discourses, by the Rev. John Brown D.D., professor of exegetical theology to the United Presbyterian Church.

Introductory Note.—Simon—surnamed by the Lord, Peter—was the son of Jonas, and was born at Bethsaida, on the sea of Galilee. In early life he carried on the business of a fisherman at Capernaum, residing with his wife's mother. Tradition represents his wife's name as Concordia, or Perpetua, and states that she was martyred during her husband's lifetime. After the Ascension, St. Peter took the lead amongst the disciples of Christ, and the Church was largely increased through his preaching (Acts ii., iii.). His prominence in the Church's history continues till, under Divine direction, he baptised Cornelius and his friends. Then, the door being opened for the larger work of the conversion of the Gentiles, the Apostle of the Gentiles occupies the foremost place. The Roman Catholic assertion that Peter was for twenty-five years Bishop of Rome is chronologically impossible, as, on that supposition, he must have been for some years Bishop of Rome when, according to St. Paul (Gal. ii. 11), he was living at Antioch. The First Epistle of Peter was universally received by the

what we have not is hypocrisy, and to deny what we have is ingratitude. 2nd. He mentions his apostolical function as his warrant and call to write this epistle to these people. Learn, It concerns all, but especially ministers, to consider well their warrant and call from God to their work. This will justify them to others, and give them inward support and comfort under all dangers and discouragements.

Secondly. We have here the persons to whom this epistle was addressed, and they are described.

1. By their external condition. Strangers dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. They were chiefly Jews, descended (as Dr. Prideaux thinks) from those Jews that were transplanted from Babylon, by order of Antiochus, king of Syria, about two hundred years before the coming of Christ, and placed in the cities of lesser Asia. It is very likely that our apostle had been among them, and converted them, being the apostle of the circumcision, and afterwards writes this epistle to them from Babylon, where multitudes of the Jewish nation then resided.

[The general opinion is, that the persons referred to were Christians, converted from both Jews and Gentiles, with no particular reference to their extraction; that there were those among them who had been converted from the Jews, and those who had been Gentiles, and that the apostle addresses them as Christians, though employing language such as the Jews had been accustomed to, when speaking of those of their own nation who were scattered abroad.—Barnes.]

At present their circumstances were poor and afflicted. Learn, 1st. The best of God's servants may, through the hardships of times and providences, be dispersed about, and forced to leave their native countries. Those of whom the world was not worthy have been forced to wander in mountains, in dens, and caves of the earth. 2nd. We ought to have a special regard to the dispersed, persecuted servants of God. These were the objects of this apostle's particular care and compassion. We should proportion our regard to the excellency and to the necessity of the saints. 3rd. The value of good people ought not to be estimated by their external present condition. Here was a set of excellent people, beloved of God, and yet strangers, dispersed and poor in the world; the eye of God was upon them in all their dispersions, and the apostle was tenderly careful to write to them for their direction and consolation.

2. They are described by their spiritual condition: "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father," &c. These poor strangers that were oppressed and despised in the world were nevertheless in high esteem with the great God, and in the most honourable state that any person can be in during this life; for they were,

1st. "Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father." Election is either to an office,—and so Saul was the man whom the Lord chose to be king, 1 Sam. x. 24; and our Lord tells his apostles, "Have not I chosen you twelve?" Jno. vi. 70. Or, to a church state, for the enjoyment of special privileges; and thus Israel was God's elect; Deut. vii. 6. "For thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God; the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself above all people that are upon the face of the earth." Or, to eternal salvation. God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.

[I apprehend the word "elect" here, and in a number of other places in the New Testament, does not refer directly to what has been termed the electing decree, but to the manifestation of it in the actually selecting certain individuals from amidst a world lying in wickedness, that they may be set apart to God, and become his peculiar people. The remark of Leighton appears to me very judicious: "Election here means the selecting them out of the world, and joining them to the fellowship of the people of God."—B.]

This is the election here spoken of, importing God's gracious decree or resolution to save some, and bring them, through Christ, by proper means, to eternal life. This election is said to be according to the foreknowledge of God. Foreknowledge may be taken two ways. First. For mere prescience, foresight, or understanding, that such a thing will be before it comes to pass. Thus a mathematician certainly foreknows that such a time there will be an eclipse. This sort of foreknowledge is in God, who, at one commanding view, sees all things that ever were, or are, or ever will be. But such a prescience is not the cause why any thing is so or so, though in the event it certainly will be so, as the mathematician that foresees an eclipse does not thereby cause that eclipse to be. Secondly. Foreknowledge sometimes signifieth counsel, appointment, and approbation; Acts ii. 23. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God." The death of Christ was not only foreseen but foreordained, as ver. 20. "Take it thus, so the sense is, "elect according to the counsel, ordination, and free grace of God." It is added, "according to the foreknowledge of God the Father." By the Father we are here to understand the first person of the blessed Trinity. There is an order among the three persons, though no superiority; they are equal in power and glory, and there is an agreed economy in their works. Thus, in the affair of man's redemption, election is by way of eminency ascribed to the Father, as reconciliation is to the Son, and sanctification to the Holy Ghost; though in each of these one person is not so entirely interested as to exclude the other two. Hereby the persons of the Trinity are more clearly discovered to us, and we are taught what obligations we are under to each of them distinctly.

2nd. They were elect through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. The end and last result of election is eternal life and salvation. But before that can be accomplished, every elect person must be sanctified by the Spirit, and justified by the blood of Jesus. God's decree for man's salvation always operates through sanctification of the Spirit and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. By "sanctification" here understand, not a federal sanctification only, but a real one, begun in regeneration, whereby we are renewed after the image of God, and become new creatures, and carried on in the daily exercise of holiness, mortifying our sins more and more, and living to God in all the duties of a Christian life, which is here summed up in one word, "obedience," comprehending all the duties of Christianity. By "the Spirit" some would have the apostle to mean the spirit of man, the subject sanctified. The legal or typical sanctification did operate no farther than the purifying of the flesh, but the Christian dispensation takes effect upon the spirit of man, and purifies that. Others, with better reason, think that by the Spirit is meant the Holy Ghost, the author of sanctification. He renews the mind, mortifies our sins, Rom. viii. 13, and produces his excellent fruits in the hearts of Christians, Gal. v. 22, 23. This sanctification of the Spirit implies the use of means; "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth," Jno. xvii. 17. "Unto obedience." This word, as it is pointed in our translation, is referred to what goes before it, and denotes the end of sanctification, which is to bring rebellious sinners to obedience again, to universal obedience, to obey the truth and Gospel of Christ; ver. 22, "You have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit."

3rd. They were elected to the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus." They were designed, by God's decree, to be sanctified by the Spirit, and to be purified by the merit and blood of Christ. Here is a manifest allusion to the typical sprinklings of blood under the law, which language these Jewish converts understood very well. The blood of the sacrifices must not only be shed, but sprinkled, to denote that the benefits designed thereby are applied and imputed to the offerers. Thus the blood of Christ, the grand and all-sufficient sacrifice, typified by the legal sacrifices, was not only shed, but must be sprinkled, and communicated to every one of these elect Christians, "that through faith in his blood they may obtain remission of sins," Rom. iii. 25. This blood of sprinkling justifies before God, Rom. v. 9, seals the covenant between God and us, of which the Lord's supper is a sign, Lu. xxii. 20, cleanseth from all sin, 1 Jno. i. 7, and admits us into heaven, Heb. x. 19. Note, First. That God hath elected some to eternal life,—some, not all; persons, not qualifications. Secondly. All that are chosen to eternal life as the end, are chosen to obedience as the way. Thirdly. Unless a person be sanctified by the Spirit, and sprinkled with the blood of Jesus, there will be no true obedience in the life. Fourthly. There is a consent and co-operation of all the persons of the Trinity in the affair of man's salvation, and their acts are commensurate one to another. Whoever the Father does elect, the Spirit does sanctify unto obedience, and the Son does redeem and sprinkle with his blood. Fifthly. The doctrine of the Trinity does lie at the foundation of all revealed religion. If you deny the proper deity of the Son and Holy Spirit, you invalidate the redemption of the one and the gracious operations of the other, and by that means destroy the foundation of your own safety and comfort.

Thirdly. The salutation follows, "Grace unto you, and peace be multiplied." 1. The blessings desired for them are grace and peace. 1st. "Grace." The free favour of God with all its proper effects,—pardoning, healing, assisting, and saving. 2nd. "Peace." All sorts of peace may be here intended,—domestic, civil, ecclesiastical peace in the church, and spiritual peace with God, and the feeling of it in our own consciences.

2. Here is the request or prayer in relation to these blessings, that they may "be multiplied;" which implies that they were already possessed in some degree of these blessings, and he wishes them the continuation, the increase, and the perfection of them. Learn, 1st. They that possess spiritual blessings in their own souls do earnestly desire the communication of the same to others. The grace of God is a generous, not a selfish principle. 2nd. The best blessings we can desire for ourselves, or for one another, are grace and peace, with the multiplication of them; therefore the apostles so often make this their prayer in the beginning and end of their epistles. 3rd. Solid peace cannot be enjoyed where there is no true grace; first grace, then peace. Peace without grace is mere stupidity; but grace may be true where there is for a time no actual peace, as Heman was distracted with terror, and Christ was once in an agony. 4th. The increase of grace and peace, as well as the first gift of them, is from God. Where he giveth true grace, he will give more grace; and every good man does earnestly desire the improvement and multiplication of these blessings in himself and others.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,

We come now to the body of the epistle, which begins with a congratulation of the dignity and happiness of the state of these believers, brought in under the form of a thanksgiving to God.

[It is a cold and lifeless thing to speak of spiritual things on mere report; but when men can speak of them as their own—as having share and interest in them, and some experience of their sweetness—their discourse of them is enlivened with firm belief and ardent affection; they cannot mention them, but straight their hearts are taken with such gladness as they are forced to vent in praises.]

Other epistles begin in like manner, 2 Cor. i. 3; Eph. i. 3. Here we have, First. The duty performed, which is, blessing God. A man blesteth God by a just acknowledgment of his excellency and blessedness.

Secondly. Here is the object of this blessing described by his relation to Jesus Christ; "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." Here are three names of one person, denoting his threefold office. 1. He is "Lord," a universal King or Sovereign. 2. "Jesus," a Priest or Saviour. 3. "Christ," a Prophet anointed with the Spirit, and furnished with all gifts necessary for the instruction, conduct, and salvation of his church. This God, so blessed, is the God of Christ according to his human nature, and his Father according to his Divine nature.

Thirdly. You have the reasons that oblige us to this duty of blessing God, which are in general, "his abundant mercy." All our blessings are owing to God's mercy, not to man's merit, particularly regeneration. He hath begotten us again, and this deserves our thanksgiving to God, especially if we consider the fruit it produceth in us, which is that excellent grace of hope, and that not such a vain, dead, perishing hope, as that of worldlings and hypocrites, but a lively hope, a living, strong, quickening, and durable hope, as that hope must needs be that hath such a solid foundation as the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

1. That a good Christian's condition is never so bad but he hath great reason still to bless God. As a sinner hath always reason to mourn, notwithstanding his present prosperity, so good people, in the midst of their manifold difficulties, have reason still to rejoice and bless God.

2. In our prayers and praises we should address God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is only through him that we and our services are accepted.

3. The best of men owe their best blessings to the abundant mercy of God. All the evil in the world is from man's sin, but all the good in it is from God's mercy. Regeneration is expressly ascribed to the abundant mercy of God; and so are all the rest; we subsist entirely upon Divine mercy. Of the nature of regeneration, see Jno. iii. 3.

4. Regeneration produceth a lively hope of eternal life. Every unconverted person is a hopeless creature. Whatever he pretends to of that kind is all confidence and presumption. The right Christian hope is what a man is begotten again unto by the Spirit of God; it is not from nature, but free grace. They that are begotten to a new and spiritual life are begotten to a new and spiritual hope.

5. The hope of a Christian hath this excellency, it is a living hope. The hope of eternal life in a true Christian is a hope that keeps him alive, quickens him, supports him, and conducts him to heaven. Hope invigorates and spirits up the soul to action, to patience, to fortitude, and perseverance to the end. The delusive hopes of the unregenerate are vain and perishing. The hypocrite and his hope expire and die both together, Job xxvii. 8.

6. The resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead is the ground or foundation of a Christian's hope. The resurrection of Christ is the act of the Father as a Judge, of the Son as a Conqueror. His resurrection demonstrates that the Father accepts his death in full discharge for our ransom; that he is victorious over death, the grave, and all our spiritual enemies. And it is also an assurance ancient Church as a part of the Christian Scriptures. In modern times objectors have doubted its genuineness, chiefly for reasons derived from the epistle itself, such as want of originality, &c.; but these objections are ably answered by Alford. The epistle was addressed to the Christian converts, both Jews and Gentiles, in the churches named in verse 1, and was written from Babylon, on the Euphrates. Its date is variously placed by commentators, but the strongest evidence seems in favour of the years between 63 and 67 A.D.

i. 1, 2. Literally, "to the elect sojourners of the dispersion." See Heb. xi. 13, where the same word is rendered "pilgrims." "To the chosen men, to the strangers of the scattering abroad" (Wickliffe). See also John vii. 35 on the dispersed converts. "According to the foreknowledge:" "The fact of knowledge is specially put forward, seeing that all God's decrees rest on the ground of his omniscience" (Huther). "Unto obedience," &c.: shows that the election here spoken of was to salvation; all the persons of the Holy of our own resurrection, there being an inseparable union between Christ and his flock; they rise by virtue of his resurrection as a Head, rather than by virtue of his power as a Judge. "We are risen with Christ," Col. i. 1. From all this taken together Christians have two fast, solid foundations whereon to build their hope of eternal life.

4 To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you,

The apostle continues his thanksgiving to God; and having congratulated these people on their new birth, and their hope of everlasting life, he goes on to describe that life under the notion of an inheritance. A most proper way of speaking to these people. For, 1. They were poor and persecuted, perhaps turned out of their inheritances to which they were born. To allay this grievance, he tells them they were new born to a new inheritance infinitely better than what they had lost. 2. They were Jews, most of them, and so had a mighty affection to the land of Canaan, as the land of their inheritance, settled upon them by God himself; and to be driven out from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord was looked upon as a sore judgment, 1 Sam. xxvi. 19. To comfort them under this, they are put in mind of a noble inheritance reserved in heaven for them, such a one as the land of Canaan was but a mere shadow in comparison with it. Note.

First. That heaven is the undoubted inheritance of all the children of God; all that are born again are born to an inheritance, as a man makes his child his heir. The apostle argues, "If children, then heirs," Rom. viii. 17. God giveth his gifts unto all, but the inheritance to none but his children. Those that are his sons and daughters by regeneration and adoption receive the promise of eternal inheritance," Heb. ix. 15. This inheritance is not our purchase, but our Father's gift; not wages that we merit, but the effect of grace, which first makes us children, and then settles this inheritance upon us by a firm, unalterable covenant.

Secondly. The incomparable excellencies of this inheritance, which are four:

1. It is "incorruptible." In which respect it is like its Maker, who is called "the incorruptible God," Rom. i. 23. All corruption is a change from better to worse; but heaven is without change and without end. The house is "eternal in the heavens," and the possessors must subsist for ever, "for their corruptible must put on incorruption," 1 Cor. xv. 53.

2. This inheritance is "undefiled," like the great High Priest that is now in possession of it, who is "holy, harmless, and undefiled," Heb. vii. 26. Sin and misery, the two grand defilements that spoil this world and mar its beauty, have no place there.

3. It "fadeth not away," but always retains its vigour and beauty, and remains immarcescible, ever entertaining and pleasing the saints that possess it, without the least weariness or distaste.

4. "Reserved in heaven for you." Which expression teaches us, 1st. That it is a glorious inheritance, for it is in heaven, and all that is there is glorious, Eph. i. 18. 2nd. It is certain, a reversion in another world, safely kept and preserved till we come to the possession of it. 3rd. The persons for whom it is reserved are described, not by their names, but by character: "For you," or us, or every one that is begotten again to a lively hope. This inheritance is preserved for them, and none but them; all the rest will be shut out for ever.

5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation ready to be revealed in the last time.

This inheritance being described as future, and distant both in time and place, the apostle supposeth some doubt or uneasiness yet to remain upon the minds of these people, whether they might not possibly fall short by the way. Though the happiness be safe in heaven, yet we are still upon earth, liable to abundance of temptations, miseries, and infirmities. Are we in such safe state that we shall certainly come there? To this he answers that they should be safely guarded and conducted thither; they should be kept and preserved from all such destructive temptations and injuries as would prevent their safe arrival at eternal life. The heir to an earthly estate hath no assurance that he shall live to enjoy it, but the heirs of heaven shall certainly be conducted safe to the possession of it. The blessing here promised is preservation, "Ye are kept;" the author of it, God. The means in us made use of for that end are our own faith and care; the end to which we are preserved is salvation, and the time when we shall see the safe end and issue of all is the last time.

Note, 1. Such is the tender care of God over his people, that he not only gives them grace, but preserves them unto glory. Their being kept implies both danger and deliverance. They may be attacked, but shall not be overcome.

2. The preservation of the regenerate to eternal life is the effect of God's power. The greatness of the work, the number of enemies, and our own infirmities, are such as no power but what is almighty can preserve the soul through all unto salvation. Therefore the Scripture often represents man's salvation as the effect of Divine power, 2 Cor. xii. 9; Rom. xiv. 4. 3. The preservation of God's power does not supersede man's endeavour and care for his own salvation. Here are God's power and man's faith, which implies an earnest desire of salvation, a reliance upon Christ, according to his invitations and promises, a vigilant care to do every thing pleasing to God, and avoid whatever is offensive; an abhorrence of temptations, a respect to the recompence of reward, and persevering diligence in prayer. By such a patient, operating, conquering faith, we are kept under the assistance of Divine grace unto salvation. Faith is a sovereign preservative of the soul through a state of grace unto a state of glory. 4. This salvation is ready to be revealed in the last time. Here are three things asserted about the salvation of the saints. 1st. That it is now prepared and made ready, and reserved in heaven for them. 2nd. Though it be made ready now, yet it is in a great measure hidden and unrevealed at present, not only to the ignorant, blind world, that never inquire after it, but even to the heirs of salvation themselves; "It does not yet appear what we shall be," 1 Jno. iii. 2. 3rd. That it shall be fully and completely revealed in the last time, or at the last day of judgment. Life and immortality are now brought to light by the Gospel; but this life will be revealed more gloriously at death, when the soul shall be admitted into the presence of Christ, and behold his glory. And even beyond this there will be a farther and a final revelation of the amplitude and transcendence of the saints' felicity at the last day, when their bodies shall be raised and reunited to their souls, and judgment shall pass upon angels and men, and Christ shall publicly honour and applaud his servants in the face of all the world.

6 Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations:

Trinity are represented as acting together in man's salvation. "By this description of the readers, an anticipation is given of the whole train of thought in the epistle, the aim of which is to impress the blessed certainty of salvation, and with that the obligations incurred by receiving God's gift."

i. 4. "An inheritance," &c.: this inheritance the apostle elsewhere speaks of as "salvation" (verses 5, 9), "grace" (verse 13), "the grace of life" (chap. iii. 7), "glory" (chap. v. 1), "an unfading

The first word, "wherein," refers to the apostle's foregoing discourse about the excellency of their present state, and their grand expectations for the future. In this condition "you greatly rejoice, though now for a season," or a little while, "if need be, ye are made sorrowful through manifold temptations." The apostle grants they were in great affliction, and propounds several things in mitigation of their sorrows.

Note, 1. Every sound Christian hath always something wherein he may greatly rejoice. Great rejoicing contains more than an inward, placid serenity of mind, or sensation of comfort. It will shew itself in the countenance and carriage, but especially in praise and gratitude. 2. The chief joy of a good Christian ariseth from things spiritual and heavenly,—from his relation to God and to heaven. In these every sound Christian greatly rejoiceth. His joy ariseth from his treasure, which consists in matters of great value, and the title to them is sure. 3. The best Christians, those that have reason greatly to rejoice, may yet be in great heaviness through manifold temptations. All sorts of adversities are temptations or trials of faith, patience, and constancy. These seldom go singly, but are manifold, and come from different quarters; the effect of all which is great heaviness. As men, we are subject to sorrows, personal and domestic, and as Christians our duty to God obliges us to frequent sorrow; and our compassion towards the miserable, the dishonour done to God, the calamities of his church, and the destruction of mankind, from their own folly and from Divine vengeance, raises, in a generous and pious mind, almost, continual sorrow: "I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart," Rom. ix. 2. 4. The afflictions and sorrows of good people are but for a little while, they are but for a season. Though they may be smart, they are but short. Life itself is but for a little while, and the sorrows of it cannot survive it. The shortness of any affliction does much abate the heaviness of it. 5. Great heaviness is often necessary to a Christian's good: "If need be ye are in heaviness." God does not afflict his people willingly, but acts with judgment in proportion to our needs. There is a conveniency and fitness, nay, an absolute necessity, in the case; for so the expression signifies it must be. Therefore "no man should be moved by these afflictions; for yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto," 1 Thes. iii. 3. These troubles that lie heavy never come upon us but when we have need, and never stay any longer than needs must.

7 That the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise and honour and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ:

REFINERS SITTING AT WORK.

These words express the end of good people's afflictions, and the ground of their joy under them. The end of afflictions is the trial of their faith. The nature of this trial: it is "much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire." The result and effect of the trial is this, it will "be found unto praise, and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ."

Note, 1. That the afflictions of serious Christians are designed for the trial of their faith. God's design in afflicting his people is their probation, not their destruction; their advantage, not their ruin. A trial, as the word signifies, is any experiment or search made upon a man by some affliction, to prove the value and strength of his faith. This trial is made upon faith principally, rather than any other grace, because the trial of that is in effect the trial of all that is good in us. Our Christianity depends upon our faith; if that be wanting, there is nothing else that is spiritually good in us. Christ prays for this apostle, that his faith might not fail; if that be supported, all the rest will stand firm. The faith of good people is tried, that they themselves may have the comfort of it, God the glory of it, and others the benefit of it.

[In turning over the plates in Rosellini's great work on Egyptian Antiquities, we remember to have noticed a figure of a refiner, sitting on a three-legged stool, and watching the furnace with the utmost attention. A correspondent of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine (1834) relates that a lady, apprehending there was something remarkable in the expressions of the text, determined to call on a silversmith and make inquiries of him, without naming her object. In answer to her inquiries the process of silver-refining was fully explained to her. "But, Sir," said she, "do you sit, while the work of refining is going on?"—"O, yes, Madam," replied the silversmith, "I must sit, with my eye steadily fixed on the furnace; for, if the time necessary for refining be exceeded in the slightest degree, the silver is sure to be injured." At once, we are told, she saw the beauty, and comfort too, of the expression. As she was going, the silversmith called her back, to mention the further fact, that he only knew when the process of purifying was complete by seeing his own image reflected in the silver.—"Beautiful figure! when Christ sees his own image in his people, his work of purifying is accomplished."—Pictorial Bible.]

2. A tried faith is much more precious than tried gold. Here is a double comparison of faith and gold, and the trial of the one with the trial of the other. Gold is the most valuable, pure, useful, and durable, of all the metals; so is faith among the Christian virtues; it lasts till it brings the soul to heaven, and then it issues in the glorious fruition of God for ever. The trial of faith is much more precious than the trial of gold. In both there is a purification, a separation of the dross, and a discovery of the soundness and goodness of the things. Gold does not increase and multiply by trial in the fire, it rather grows crown of glory" (chap. v. 4), "eternal glory" (chap. v. 10). "Our inheritance is glorious in three respects—it is in substance incorruptible, in purity undefiled, in beauty unfading" (Alford); and this inheritance is laid up in the heavens, "that we may know it to be beyond danger" (Calvin).

i. 5. "Kept by the power of God:" the only one who can guard us surely. "It is his power which saves us from our enemies, it is his long-suffering which saves us from ourselves" (Bengel). "Unto less; but faith is established, improved, and multiplied by the oppositions and afflictions that it meets with. Gold must perish at last—"gold that perisheth;" but faith never will. "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not," Lu. xii. 32.

3. The trial of faith will be found to praise, and honour, and glory. Honour is properly that esteem and value which one hath with another; and so God and man will honour the saints. Praise is the expression or declaration of that esteem; so Christ will commend his people in the great day, "Come, ye blessed of my Father," &c. Glory is that lustre wherewith a person so honoured and praised shines in heaven. "Glory, honour, and peace, to every man that worketh good," Rom. ii. 10. If a tried faith be found to praise, honour, and glory, let this recommend faith to you as much more precious than gold, though it be assailed and tried by afflictions. If you make your estimate either from present use, or the final event of both, it will be found true. However, the world takes it for an incredible paradox.

4. That Jesus Christ will appear again in glory; and when he does so, the saints will appear with him, and their graces will appear illustrious; and the more they have been tried, the more bright they will then appear; the trial will soon be over, but the glory, honour, and praise, will last to eternity. This should reconcile you to your present afflictions; "They work for you a far more exceeding and an eternal weight of glory."

8 Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory:

The faith of these primitive Christians is farther commended upon two accounts:—

First. The excellency of its object: the unseen Jesus. The apostle had seen our Lord in the flesh, but these dispersed Jews never did, and yet they believed in him. It is one thing to believe God or Christ,—so the devils believe,—another thing to believe in him, which denotes subjection, reliance, and expectation of all promised good from him.

Secondly. On account of two notable productions or effects of their faith, love and joy; and this joy so great, as to be above description. "Ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

Learn, 1. The faith of a Christian is properly conversant about things revealed, but not seen. Sense converseth with things sensible and present; reason is a higher guide, and that, by sure deductions, can infer the operation of causes, and the certainty of events; but faith ascends farther still, and assures us of abundance of particulars, that sense and reason could never have found out, upon the credit of revelation; it is "the evidence of things not seen." 2. True faith is never alone, but produceth a strong love to Jesus Christ. True Christians have a dear love to Jesus, because they believe in him. This love discovers itself in highest esteem for him, affectionate desires after him, willingness to be dissolved to be with him, delightful thoughts, cheerful services and sufferings, &c. 3. Where there are true faith and love to Christ there is, or may be, "joy unspeakable and full of glory." This joy is inexpressible; it cannot be described by words; the best discovery is by an experimental taste of it; it is full of glory, full of heaven. There is much of heaven and the future glory in the present joy of improved Christians; their faith removes the causes of sorrow, and affords the best reasons for joy. Though good people sometimes walk in darkness, it is often owing to their own mistakes and ignorance, or to a fearful, melancholy disposition; or to some late sinful miscarriage; or perhaps to some sad occurrence of Providence, that sinks their comfort for the present; yet they have reason to "rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of their salvation." Hab. iii. 18.

9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

Well might these Christians rejoice with joy unspeakable, since they were every day receiving the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls. Note,

First. The blessing they were receiving: "The salvation of souls;" the more noble part being put for the whole man; which salvation is here called the end of their faith, the end wherein faith terminates; it helps to save the soul; then it hath done its work, and ceaseth for ever.

Secondly. He speaks of the present time. You are now actually "receiving the end of your faith," &c.

Thirdly. The word used alludes to the games at which the conqueror received or bore away from the judge of the contest a crown or reward, which he carried about in triumph. So the salvation of the soul was the prize these Christians sought for, the crown they laboured for, the end they aimed at, which came nearer and more within their reach every day.

Learn, 1. That every faithful Christian is daily receiving the salvation of his soul. Salvation is one permanent thing, begun in this life, not interrupted by death, and continued to all eternity. These believers had the beginnings of heaven in the possession of holiness and a heavenly mind, in their duties and communion with God, in the earnest of the inheritance, and the witness of the Divine Spirit. This was properly urged to these distressed people; they were on the losing side in the world. The apostle puts them in mind of what they were receiving. If they lost an inferior good, they were all the while receiving the salvation of their souls. 2. It is lawful for a Christian to make the salvation of his soul his end. The glory of God and our own felicity are so connected, that, if we regularly seek the one, we must attain the other.

10 Of which salvation the prophets have enquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you:

The apostle having described the persons to whom he wrote, and declared to them the excellent advantages they were under, he goes on to shew them what warrant he had for what he had delivered; and because they were Jews, and had a mighty veneration for the Old Testament, he produceth the authority of the prophets, to convince them that the doctrine of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ was no new doctrine, but the same which the old prophets did inquire and search diligently into. Note,

First. Who made this diligent search. The prophets, who were persons inspired by God to the doing or saying things extraordinary, above the reach of their own studies and abilities, foretelling things to come, and revealing the will of God, by the direction of the Holy Spirit.

Secondly. The object of their search, which was salvation, and the "grace of God which should come unto you;" the general salvation of men of all nations by Jesus Christ, and more especially the salvation afforded to the Jews, the grace that should come to them from him who was not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. They foresaw glorious times of light, grace, and comfort, coming upon the church, which made the prophets and righteous desire to see and hear the things which came to pass in the days of the Gospel.

Thirdly. The manner of their inquiry. They "inquired and searched diligently." The words are strong and emphatical, alluding to miners that dig to the bottom, and break through, not only the earth, but the rock, to come to the ore; so these holy prophets had an earnest desire to know, and were proportionably diligent in their inquiries after, the grace of God, which was to be revealed in the days of the Messiah. Their being inspired did not make their industrious search needless; for, notwithstanding their extraordinary assistance from God, they were obliged to make use of all the ordinary methods of improvement in wisdom and knowledge. Daniel was a man greatly beloved and inspired, yet he understood, by books and study, the computations of time, ch. ix. 2. Even their own revelation required their study, meditation, and prayer; for many prophecies had a double meaning. In their first intention they aimed at some person or event near at hand; but their ultimate design was to describe the person, sufferings, or kingdom of Christ. Observe,

1. The doctrine of man's salvation by Jesus Christ hath been the study and admiration of the greatest and wisest of men. The nobleness of the subject, and their own concern in it, have engaged them with most accurate attention and seriousness to search into it.

2. A good man is much affected and pleased with the grace and mercy of God to others as well as to himself. The prophets were highly delighted with the prospects of mercy to be shewn both to Jews and Gentiles at the coming of Christ.

3. They that would be acquainted with this great salvation, and the grace that shines therein, must inquire and search diligently into it. If it were necessary for an inspired prophet to do so, much more for persons so weak and injudicious as we are.

4. The grace that came by the Gospel excels all that was before it. The gospel dispensation is more glorious, evident, intelligible, extensive, and effectual, than any dispensation that ever did precede it.

11 Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

The particular matters which the ancient prophets chiefly searched into are here expressed. Jesus Christ was the main subject of their studies, and in relation to him they were most inquisitive into,

First. His humiliation and death, and the glorious consequences of it; "The sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow." This inquiry would lead them into a view of the whole Gospel, the sum whereof is this, that Christ Jesus was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification.

Secondly. The time, and the manner of the times, wherein the Messiah was to appear. Undoubtedly these holy prophets earnestly desired to see the days of the Son of man; and therefore, next to the thing itself, their minds were set upon the time of its accomplishment, so far as the Spirit of Christ which was in them had signified any thing toward that purpose. The nature of the times were also under their strict consideration, whether they would be quiet or troublesome times; times of peace, or times of war.

Learn, 1. Jesus Christ had a being, and did exist, before his incarnation; for his Spirit did then exist in the prophets, and therefore he whose that Spirit then was must be being also. 2. The doctrine of the Trinity was not wholly unknown to the faithful in the Old Testament. The prophets knew that they were inspired by a Spirit that was in them. This Spirit they knew to be the Spirit of Christ, and consequently distinct from Christ himself. Here is a plurality of persons, and from other parts of the Old Testament a Trinity may be collected. 3. The works here ascribed to the Holy Ghost prove him to be God. He "did signify," discover, and manifest to the prophets, many hundred years beforehand, the sufferings of Christ, with a multitude of particular circumstances attending them. And he did also testify, or give proof and evidence, beforehand, of the certainty of that event, by inspiring the prophets to reveal it, to work miracles in confirmation of it, and by enabling the faithful to believe it. These works prove the Spirit of Christ to be God, since he is possessed of almighty power and infinite knowledge.

4. From the example of Christ Jesus learn to expect a time of services and sufferings before you are received to glory. It was so with him, and the discipline is not above his Lord. The suffering time is but short, but the glory is everlasting. Let the suffering season be never so sharp and severe, it shall not hinder, but "work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

12 Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things, which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into.

These words contain an answer to the prophet's inquiry. Their holy endeavours to inform themselves were not slighted, for God gives them a satisfactory revelation to quiet and comfort their minds. They were informed that these things should not come to pass in their time; but yet all was firm and certain, and should come to pass in the times of the apostles: "Not unto themselves, but to us;" and we must report them, under the infallible direction of the Holy Ghost, to all the world, "which things the angels," &c. You have here three sorts of students, or inquirers, into the great affair of man's salvation by Jesus Christ. First. The prophets search diligently into it. Secondly. The apostles, who consulted all the prophecies, and were witnesses of the accomplishment of them, and so reported what they knew to others in the preaching of the Gospel. Thirdly. The angels, who most attentively pry into these matters.

Learn, 1. A diligent endeavour after the knowledge of Christ and our duty will certainly be answered with good success. The prophets were answered with a revelation. Daniel studies and receives information; the Bereans searched the Scriptures, and were confirmed. 2. The holiest and best of men sometimes have their lawful and pious requests denied. It was both lawful and pious for these prophets to desire to know more than they were permitted to know about the time of the appearance of Christ in the world, but they were denied. It is lawful and pious for good parents to pray for their wicked children, for the poor to pray against poverty, for a good man to pray against death; yet in these honest requests they often are denied. God is pleased to answer our salvation;" salvation in itself is only a negative idea—preservation from evil—but it came to mean in the New Testament positive blessing in its highest development. (Compare James i. 21, &c.) "In the last time:" when Christ shall be revealed, through whom we have salvation.

i. 7. Alford and others object on grammatical grounds to the translation "of gold," preferring "gold," and referring it to faith, not the trial of faith. So Tyndal: "that your faith once tried, being much more precious than gold that perisheth." So also Rheims. The apostle's meaning is clearly, "If gold, which perishes, yet requires fire to prove and purify it, much more your faith, which is imperishable, requires a fiery trial to remove what is defective, and thus to strengthen it. "Unto praise," &c.: i.e., the praise of God, who is glorified by the faithfulness of his people and their holy lives (chap. iv. 11).

i. 9. "Receiving," &c.: this word excludes the idea of present

necessities rather than our requests. 3. It is the honour and practice of a Christian to be useful to others in many cases, rather than to himself. These prophets ministered to others, not unto themselves; "None of us liveth to himself," Rom. xiv. 7. Nothing more contrary to man's nature, and Christian principles, than for a man to make himself his own end, and live to himself. 4. The revelations of God to his church, though gradual, and given by parcels, are all perfectly consistent; the doctrine of the prophets and of the apostles do exactly agree, as coming from the same Spirit of God. [The sweet stream of their doctrine made its own banks fertile and pleasant, as it ran by and flowed still forward to after ages, and, by the confluence of more such prophecies, grew larger as it proceeded, till it fell in with the main current of the gospel revelation; and thus united into one river, clear as crystal, this doctrine of salvation hath still refreshed the city of God, and shall continue to do so till it empty itself into the ocean of eternity.—L.] 5. The efficacy of the evangelical ministry depends upon the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. The Gospel is the ministration of the Spirit; the success of it depends upon his operation and blessing. 6. The mysteries of the Gospel, and the methods of man's salvation, are so glorious, that the blessed angels do earnestly desire to look into them. They are curious, accurate, and industrious in prying into them; they consider the whole scheme of man's redemption with deep attention and admiration, particularly these points the apostle had been discoursing of; "Which things the angels desire to" stoop down and "look into," as the cherubims did continually towards the mercy-seat. [7. What is the subject of the constant intense contemplation of angels surely deserves our most careful study. We are far more closely connected with, far more deeply interested in, the subject of study than they. The salvation they desire to look into will promote, but it will but indirectly promote, their happiness. Their happiness may be secure without reference to it. But as to us, this salvation must be ours, or we are undone for ever and ever. It is now that an interest is to be obtained in it, if obtained at all. It is only by knowing and believing the truth about this salvation that an interest in it is to be obtained. Oh, then, let us, with intensest ardour, seek the knowledge of this salvation! If we die unacquainted with it, we die uninterested in it; and if we die uninterested in it, it never, never can become ours. "Now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation."—B.]

13 Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ;

Here the apostle begins his exhortation to them whose glorious state he had before described, thereby instructing us that Christianity is a doctrine according to godliness, designed not only to make us wiser, but better. [This is the effect which the believing contemplation of the heavenly blessedness is calculated and intended to have on the mind. It is not intended to afford an indolent delight, but a powerful excitement.—B.] Wherefore, since you are so honoured and distinguished, as above,

First, "Gird up the loins of your mind." You have a journey to go, a race to run, a warfare to accomplish, and a great work to do. As the traveller, the racer, the warrior, and the labourer, gather in and gird up their long and loose garments, that they may be more ready, prompt, and expeditious in their business, so do you, by your minds, your inner man, and affections seated there, gird them, gather them in, let them not hang loose and neglected about you; restrain their extravagances, and let the loins or strength and vigour of your minds be exerted in your duty. Disengage yourselves from all that would hinder you, and go on resolutely in your obedience.

Secondly, "Be sober," be vigilant, against all your spiritual dangers and enemies; and be temperate and modest in eating, drinking, apparel, recreation, business, and in the whole of your behaviour. Be sober-minded also in opinion, as well as in practice, and humble in your judgment of yourselves.

Thirdly, "And hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought to you at the revelation of Jesus Christ." Some refer this to the last judgment, as if the apostle did direct their hope to the final revelation of Jesus Christ; but it seems more natural to take it, as it might be rendered, Hope perfectly or thoroughly for the grace that is brought to you in, or by, the revelation of Jesus Christ; that is, by the Gospel, which brings life and immortality to light. Hope perfectly, trust without doubting, to that grace which is now offered to you by the Gospel.

Learn, 1. The main work of a Christian lies in the right management of his heart and mind. The apostle's first direction is, to gird up the loins of the mind. 2. The best Christians have need to be exhorted to sobriety. These excellent Christians are put in mind of it. It is required of a bishop, 1 Tim. iii. 2; of aged men, Tit. ii. 2. The young women are to be taught it, and the young men are directed to be sober-minded, Tit. ii. 4, 6. 3. A Christian's work is not over as soon as he has got into a state of grace. He must still hope and strive for more grace. When he hath entered the strait gate, he must still walk in the narrow way, and gird up the loins of his mind for that purpose. 4. A strong and perfect trust in God's grace is very consistent with our best endeavours in our duty. We must hope perfectly, and yet gird up our loins, and address ourselves vigorously to the work we have to do, encouraging ourselves from the grace of Jesus Christ.

[It is a foolish, misgrounded fear, and such as argues inexperience of the nature and workings of Divine grace, to imagine that the assured hope of salvation will beget unholiness and presumptuous boldness in sin. Our apostle is not so sharp-sighted as these men think themselves; he apprehends no such matter; he, indeed, supposes the contrary as unquestionable; he takes not assured hope and holiness as enemies, but joins them as honest friends. Hope perfectly, in order to your being holy in all manner of conversation. The more assurance of salvation, the more holiness, the more delight in it, the more study of it, as the only way to that end: and as labour is then most pleasant when we are made sure that it shall not be lost, nothing doth make the soul so nimble and active in obedience as this oil of gladness, this assured hope of glory.—L.]

The exhortation is continued, and the words may be taken either as a rule of holy living, which is both positive, You ought to live as obedient children, as those whom God hath adopted into his family, and regenerated by his grace,—and negative, You must not fashion yourselves "according to the former lusts in your ignorance," or the words may be taken as an argument to press them to holiness from the consideration of what they now are—children of obedience, and what they were when they lived in lust and ignorance.

Learn, 1. The children of God ought to prove themselves to be such by their obedience to God; by their present, constant, universal obedience. 2. The best of God's children have had their times of lust and ignorance. The time hath been when the whole scheme of their lives, their way, and fashion, was to accommodate and gratify their unlawful desires and vicious appetites, being grossly ignorant of God and themselves, of Christ and the Gospel. 3. Persons converted differ exceedingly from what they were formerly. They are people of another fashion and manner from what they were before; their inward frame, behaviour, speech, and conversation, are much altered from what it was in times past. 4. The lusts and extravagances of sinners are both the fruits and signs of their ignorance.

15 But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; 16 Because it is written, Be ye holy; for I am holy.

Here is a noble rule enforced by strong arguments; "Be ye holy in all manner of conversation." Who is sufficient for this? And yet it is required in strong terms, and enforced by three reasons, taken from the grace of God in calling us; from his command, "It is written;" and from his example, "Be ye holy, for I am holy."

Learn, 1. The grace of God in calling a sinner is a powerful engagement to holiness. It is a mighty favour to be called effectually by Divine grace out of a state of sin and misery into the possession of all the blessings of the new covenant, and great favours are strong obligations. It does enable as well as oblige to holiness. 2. Complete holiness is the desire and duty of every Christian. Here is a twofold rule of holiness: 1st. It must, for the extent of it, be universal, must "be holy," and be so "in all manner of conversation;" in all civil and religious affairs; in every condition, prosperous or adverse; towards all people, friends or enemies; in all our intercourse and business, still we must be holy. 2nd. For the pattern of it we must be holy as God is holy; we must imitate him, though we can never equal him; he is perfectly, unchangeably, eternally, holy; and we should aspire after such a state. The consideration of the holiness of God should oblige us to the highest degrees of holiness, we can attain unto. 3. The written word of God is the surest rule of a Christian's life, and by this rule we are commanded to be holy every way. 4. The Old Testament commands are to be studied and obeyed in the times of the New Testament. The apostle, by virtue of a command delivered several times by Moses, requires holiness in all Christians.

17 And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear:

The apostle does not here express any doubt at all whether these Christians would call upon their heavenly Father, but supposes they would certainly do it, and from that argues with them to pass the time of their sojourning here in fear. If you own the great God as a Father and a Judge, you ought to live the time of your sojourning here in his fear.

Learn, 1. All good Christians look upon themselves in this world as pilgrims and sojourners, as strangers in a distant country, passing to another, to which they properly belong, Ps. xxxix. 12; Heb. xi. 13. 2. The whole time of our sojourning here is to be passed in the fear of God. 3. The consideration of God as a Judge is not improper for those that can truly call him Father. Holy confidence in God as a Father, and an awful fear of him as a Judge, are very consistent. To regard God as a Judge is a singular means to endear him to us as a Father. 4. The judgment of God will be without respect of persons: "according to every man's works." No external relation to him will protect any. The Jew may call God Father, and Abraham father, but God will not respect persons, or favour their cause from personal considerations, but judge them according to their work. The works of men will in the great day discover their persons. God will make all the world to know who are his by their works. We are obliged to faith, holiness, and obedience, and our works will be an evidence whether we have complied with our obligations or no.

18 Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; 19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot:

The apostle having exhorted to pass the time of our life in the fear of God from this consideration, that we call on the Father, he adds in these words a second argument, because or forasmuch as we are redeemed by the Son, &c. Wherein he puts them in mind, First. That they were redeemed, or brought back again by a ransom paid to the Father. Secondly. What the price paid for their redemption was; "Not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." Thirdly. They knew this; "Forasmuch as ye know," and cannot pretend ignorance of this great affair. Fourthly. From what they were redeemed; from a "vain conversation received by tradition."

Learn, 1. That the consideration of our redemption ought to be a constant and powerful inducement to holiness and the fear of God. [This is an answer for all the enticements of sin and of the world,—Except you can offer my soul something beyond the price that was given for it on the cross, I cannot hearken to you. Far be it from me that I should prefer a base lust, or any thing in this world, or it all, to him who gave himself to death for me, and paid my ransom with his blood. His matchless love has freed me from the miserable captivity of sin, and hath for ever fastened me to the sweet yoke of obedience. Let him alone to dwell and rule in me, and let him never go forth from my heart, who, for my sake, refused to come down from the cross.—L.] 2. God expects that a Christian should live answerably to what he knows, and therefore we have great need to be put in mind of what we already know, Ps. xxxix. 4. 3. Neither silver nor gold, nor any of the corruptible things of this world, can redeem so much as one soul. They are often snares, temptations, and hindrances to man's salvation, but they can by no means purchase or procure it. They are corruptible, and therefore cannot redeem an incorruptible and immortal soul. 4. The blood of Jesus Christ is the only price of man's redemption. The redemption of man is real, not metaphorical; "We are bought with a price," and the price is equal to the purchase, for it is the precious blood of Christ; it is the blood of an innocent person, a Lamb without blemish and without spot, whom the paschal lamb did represent; and of an infinite person, being the Son of God, and therefore is called the blood of God, Acts xx. 28. 5. The design of Christ in shedding his most precious blood was to redeem us realisation of the "unspeakable joy," as it is always used of the future. (See 2 Cor. v. 10; Eph. vi. 8; Col. iii. 25.) "Believing, ye that believe shall have joy and gladness that may not be told out, and ye shall be glorified and have the end of your faith, the health of your souls" (Wickliffe).

i. 10—12. "Searched," &c.: "The prophets, as private individuals, had to reflect on the hidden and far-reaching sense of their own prophecies; because their words, as prophets in their public function, were not so much their own as the Spirit's, speaking by and in them. Thus Caiaphas" (Fausset). "Angels desire," &c.: see Eph. iii. 10. They, as ministers to the heirs of salvation, naturally are deeply interested in the plan of salvation.

i. 15. Best MSS. read, "Ye shall be holy."

i. 21. "In God:" "Your faith rests on Christ's resurrection—it was God who raised him; your hope on Christ's glorification—it is God who has given him that glory" (Alford).

not only from eternal misery hereafter, but from a vain conversation in this world. That conversation is vain that is empty, frivolous, trifling, and unserviceable to the honour of God, the credit of religion, the conviction of unbelievers, and the comfort and satisfaction of a man's own conscience. Not only the open wickedness, but the vanity and unprofitableness of our conversation is highly dangerous. 6. It is possible a man's conversation may carry an appearance of devotion, and may plead antiquity, custom, and tradition in its defence, and yet after all be a most vain conversation. The Jews had a deal to say from these heads for all their formalities; and yet their conversation was so vain, that only the blood of Christ could redeem them from it. Antiquity is no certain rule of verity, nor is it a wise resolution, I will live and die in such a way, because my forefathers did so.

20 Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you, 21 Who by him do believe in God, that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory; that your faith and hope might be in God.

First. The Redeemer is farther described, not only as a Lamb without spot, but as one,

1. That was foreordained before the foundation of the world,—"foreordained," or foreknown. When prescience is ascribed to God, it implies more than bare prospect or speculation. It does import an act of the will, a resolution that the thing shall be, Acts ii. 23. God did not only foreknow, but determine and decree, that his Son should die for man, and this decree was "before the foundation of the world." Time and the world began together; before the commencement of time there was nothing but eternity.

2. That he was manifest in these last days for you. He was manifested or demonstrated to be that Redeemer whom God had foreordained. He was manifest by his birth, by his Father's testimony, and by his own works, especially by his resurrection from the dead, Rom. i. 4. This was done "in these last times" of the New Testament, and of the Gospel, "for you," you Jews, you sinners, you afflicted ones; you have the comfort of the manifestation and appearance of Christ, if you believe on him.

3. That God raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory. The resurrection of Christ, considered as an act of power, is common to all the three persons; but as an act of judgment, it is peculiar to the Father, who, as a Judge, released Christ, and raised him from the grave, and "gave him glory," proclaimed him to all the world to be his Son by his resurrection from the dead, advanced him to heaven, crowned him with glory and honour, invested him with all power in heaven and earth, and glorified him with that glory which he had with God before the world was.

Secondly. The redeemed are also described here by their faith and hope, the cause of which is Jesus Christ; you "do by him believe in God." By him as the author, encourager, support, and finisher of your faith; your faith and hope now may be in God, as reconciled to you by Christ the Mediator.

[When you look through a red glass the whole heavens seem bloody, but through pure, uncoloured glass, you receive the clear light, that is so refreshing and comfortable to behold. When sin unpardoned is betwixt, and we look on God through that, we can perceive nothing but anger and enmity in his countenance; but make Christ once the medium, our pure Redeemer, and through him, as clear transparent glass, the beams of God's favourable countenance shine in upon the soul; the Father cannot look upon his well-beloved Son but graciously and pleasantly. Therefore set him always betwixt, and by him we shall believe in God.]

The warrant and ground of believing in God by Christ is this, that God raised him from the dead and gave him glory, for this end expressly, that our faith and hope might be in God: the last end is, that we may have life and glory through him; the nearer end, that in the meanwhile, till we attain them, we may have firm belief and hope of them, and rest on God as the giver of them, and so in part enjoy them beforehand, and be upheld in our joy and conflicts by the comfort of them; and as St. Stephen in his vision, Acts vii. 55. Faith doth, in a spiritual way, look through all the visible heavens, and see Christ at the Father's right hand, and is comforted by that in the greatest troubles, though it were amidst a shower of stones, as St. Stephen was. The comfort is no less than this, that being by faith made one with Christ, his present glory, wherein he sits at the Father's right hand, is assurance to us "that where he is we shall be also," Jno. xiv. 3.—L.

Learn, 1. The decree of God to send Christ to be a Mediator was from everlasting, and was a just and merciful decree, which yet does not at all excuse man's sin in crucifying him, Acts ii. 23. God hath purposes of special favours towards his people long before he makes any manifestations of such grace unto them. 2. Great is the happiness of the last times in comparison with what the former ages of the world did enjoy. The clearness of light, the supports of faith, the efficacy of ordinances, and the proportion of comforts, these are all much larger since the manifestation of Christ than they were before. Our gratitude and services should be suitable to such favours. 3. The redemption of Christ belongs to none but true believers. A general imputation is asserted by some and denied by others, but none pretend to a general application of Christ's death for the salvation of all. Hypocrites and unbelievers will be ruined for ever, notwithstanding the death of Christ. 4. God in Christ is the ultimate object of a Christian's faith, which is strongly supported by the resurrection of Christ, and the glory that did follow.

22 Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently:

Here the apostle begins another exhortation to brotherly love, wherein he supposeth that the Gospel had already such an effect upon them as to purify their souls, while they obeyed it through the Spirit, and that it had produced at least an "unfeigned love of the brethren;" and from thence he argues with them to proceed to a higher degree of affection, to "love one another with a pure heart fervently."

Learn, 1. It is not to be doubted but that every sincere Christian purifies his soul. The apostle takes that for granted, "Seeing ye have," &c. To purify the soul supposeth some great uncleanness and defilement which hath polluted it, and that this defilement is removed. Neither the Levitical purifications under the law, nor the hypocritical purifications of the outward man, can effect this. 2. The word of God is the great instrument of a sinner's purification: "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth." The Gospel is called truth in opposition to types and shadows, and to error and falsehood. This truth is effectual to purify the soul, if it be obeyed, Jno. xvii. 17. Many hear the truth, but are never purified by it; because they will not submit to it, nor obey it. 3. The Spirit of God is the great agent in the purification of man's soul. The Spirit convinceth the soul of its impurities, furnishes those virtues and graces that do both adorn and purify, such as faith, Acts xv. 9; hope, 1 Jno. iii. 3; the fear of God, Ps. xxxiv. 9; and the love of Jesus Christ. The Spirit excites our endeavours and makes them successful. The aid of the Spirit does not supersede our own industry; these people purified their own souls, but it was through the Spirit. 4. The souls of Christians must be purified before they can so much as love one another unfeignedly. There are those lusts and partialities in man's nature, that without Divine grace we can neither love God nor one another as we ought to do. There is no charity but out of "a pure heart." 5. It is the duty of all Christians sincerely and fervently to love one another. Our affection to one another must be sincere and real, and it must be fervent, constant, and extensive.

23 Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever.

This duty of loving one another with a pure heart fervently the apostle does farther press upon Christians, from the consideration of their spiritual relation; they are all "born again, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, by the word of God," &c. [That word is eternal truth. That truth, introduced into the heart through Divine influence, by being understood and believed, becomes a living, active, operative principle there, producing holiness and joy. And it "abideth for ever;" it dwells an ever-living principle in an indestructible shrine, the never-dying human spirit; and dwelling for ever there, in the case of all the holy family, it forms an everlasting link of connexion with their common Father, and with each other.—B.] From whence we may Learn, 1. That all Christians are born again. The apostle speaks of it as what is common to all serious Christians, and by this they are brought into a new and a near relation one to another; they become brethren by their new birth. 2. The word of God is the great means of regeneration, Jas. i. 18. The grace of regeneration is conveyed by the Gospel. 3. This new and second birth is much more desirable and excellent than the first. This the apostle teacheth by preferring the incorruptible to the corruptible seed. By the one we become the children of men, by the other the sons and daughters of the Most High. The word of God being compared to seed teacheth us, that though it be little in appearance, yet it is wonderful in operation; though it lies hid awhile, yet grows up and produceth excellent fruit at last. 4. Those that are regenerate should love one another with a pure heart fervently. Brethren by nature are bound to love one another; but the obligation is double where there is a spiritual relation; they are under the same government, partake of the same privileges, and are embarked in the same interest. 5. The word of God liveth and abideth for ever. This word is a living word, or a lively word, Heb. iv. 12. It is a means of spiritual life, to begin it and preserve in it, animating and exciting us in our duty, till it brings us to eternal life; and it is abiding; it remains eternally true, and abides in the hearts of the regenerate for ever.

24 For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away: 25 But the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

The apostle having given an account of the excellency of the renewed spiritual man as born again, not of corruptible, but incorruptible seed, he now sets before us the vanity of the natural man, taking him with all his ornaments and advantages about him; "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass," and nothing can make him a solid, substantial being, but the being born again of the incorruptible seed, the word of God, which will transform him into a most excellent creature, whose glory will not fade like a flower, but shine like an angel; and this word is daily set before you in the preaching of the Gospel.

Learn, 1. Man, in his utmost flourish and glory, is still a withering, fading, dying creature. Take him singly, all flesh is grass. In his entrance into the world, in his life, and in his fall, he is like to grass, Job xiv. 2; Jsa. xl. 6, 7. Take him in all his glory, even that is as the flower of grass; his wit, beauty, strength, vigour, wealth, honour, these are but as the flower of grass, which soon withers and dies away. 2. The only way to render this perishing creature solid and incorruptible is to entertain and receive the word of God, for that remains everlasting truth, and, if received, will preserve him to everlasting life, and abide with him for ever. 3. The prophets and apostles preached the same doctrine. This word, which Isaiah and others delivered in the Old Testament, is the same which the apostles preached in the New.

CHAPTER II.

The general exhortation to holiness is continued and enforced by several reasons taken from the foundation on which Christians are built, Jesus Christ, and from their spiritual blessings and privileges in him. The means of obtaining it, the word of God, is recommended, and all contrary qualities are condemned, ver. 1—12. Particular directions are given how subjects ought to obey the magistrates, and servants their masters, patiently suffering in well doing, in imitation of Christ, ver. 13—25.

HEREFORE laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocries, and envies, and all evil speakings,

The holy apostle had been recommending mutual charity, and setting forth the excellencies of the word of God, calling it an incorruptible seed, and saying that it liveth and abideth for ever; he pursues his discourse, and very properly comes in with this necessary advice, "Wherefore laying aside all malice," &c. These are such sort of sins as do both destroy charity and hinder the efficacy of the word, and consequently prevent our regeneration.

i. 22. Best MSS. omit "through the Spirit."

i. 23. "Liveth and abideth;" these words may refer to God or to the word of God, the latter probably, from verse 25. "For ever" is not found in oldest MSS.

i. 24. "All its glory;" not "the glory of man," as Authorised Version. Best MSS. omit "thereof."

ii. 1—10. "This portion of the epistle is singularly rich in thought and expression, and bears the peculiar impress of the apostle's mind, in which Judaism is spiritualised, and finds its full development in Christ" (Cook).

ii. 1. "Malice," &c.: "Malice is delighted by another's injury; envy is tormented by another's profit" (Augustine).

ii. 2. "Milk of the word" is quite inadmissible; the literal translation is, "desire the reasonable, guileless milk." The apostle uses milk, as the natural and most nutritious food of "new-born babes," to represent the spiritual food of converts, and speaks of this

His advice is to lay aside, or put off, sin, as one would do an old rotten garment, cast it away with indignation, never put it on more. The sins to be put off, or thrown aside, are,

First, "Malice," which may be taken more generally for all sorts of wickedness, as Jas. i. 21; 1 Cor. v. 8. But, in a more confined sense, malice is anger resting in the bosom of fools; settled, overgrown anger; retained till it inflames a man to design mischief, to do mischief, or delight in any mischief that befalls another.

Secondly, "Guile," or deceit in words. So it comprehends flattery, falsehood, and delusion, which is a crafty imposing upon another's ignorance or weakness, to his damage.

Thirdly, "Hypocrisies." The word being plural, comprehends all sorts of hypocrisies. In matters of religion, hypocrisy is counterfeit piety. In civil conversation, hypocrisy is counterfeit friendship, which is much practised by those that give high compliments which they do not believe, or make promises which they never intend to perform, or pretend friendship when mischief lies in their hearts.

Fourthly, All "envies." Every thing that may be called envy, which is a grieving at the good and welfare of another,—at their abilities, prosperity, fame, or successful labours.

Fifthly, "Evil-speaking," which is detraction, speaking against another, or defaming him; it is rendered "backbiting," 2 Cor. xii. 20; Rom. i. 30.

Learn, 1. The best Christians have need to be cautioned and warned against the worst sins, such as malice, hypocrisy, envy. They are but sanctified in part, and are still liable to temptations. 2. Our best services towards God will neither please him nor profit us, if we are not conscientious in our duties to men. The sins here mentioned are offences against the second table. These must be laid aside, or else we cannot receive the word of God as we ought to do. 3. Whereas it is said, "all malice," "all guile," learn, That one sin not laid aside will hinder our spiritual profit and everlasting welfare. 4. Malice, envy, hatred, hypocrisy, and evil-speaking, generally go together. Evil-speaking is a sign that malice and guile lie in the heart, and all of them combine to hinder our profiting by the word of God.

The apostle, like a wise physician, having prescribed the purging out vicious humours, goes on to direct to wholesome and regular food, that they may grow thereby. The duty exhorted to is a strong and constant desire after the word of God, which word is here called reasonable milk; only, that phrase not being proper English, our translators turned it "the milk of the word," by which we are to understand food proper to the soul, or a reasonable creature, whereby the mind, not the body, is nourished and strengthened. This milk of the word must be sincere, not adulterated by the mixtures of men, who often corrupt the word of God, 2 Cor. ii. 17. [The word of God is pure truth, without the slightest admixture of error; it is only in the degree in which this pure truth is contained in any statement, that that statement is spiritually nourishing; and this pure word is unadulterated; it does what it professes to do, it really nourishes. "It converts the soul, it makes wise the simple, it rejoices the heart, it enlightens the eyes." It "is able to save the soul." Ps. xix. 7; 2 Tim. iii. 15; Jas. i. 21.] The manner how they are to desire this sincere milk of the word is stated thus: "As new-born babes." He puts them in mind of their regeneration. A new life requires suitable food. They being newly born must desire the milk of the word. Infants desire common milk, and their desires towards it are fervent and frequent, arising from an impatient sense of hunger, and accompanied with the best endeavours the infant is capable of; such must Christians' desires be after the word of God; and that for this end, that they may "grow thereby," that they may improve in grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, 2 Pet. iii. 18.

Learn, 1. Strong desires and affection to the word of God are a sure evidence of a person's being born again. If they be such desires as the babe hath for the milk, they prove that the person is new-born. They are the lowest evidence, but yet they are certain. 2. Growth and improvement in wisdom and grace are the design and desire of every Christian; all spiritual means are for edification and improvement. The word of God rightly used does not leave a man as it finds him, but improves and makes him better.

3 If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious.

"If so be," or 'since that,' or 'forasmuch,' as ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious. The apostle does not express a doubt, but affirms that these good Christians had tasted the goodness of God; and from hence argues with them, You ought to lay aside these vile sins, ver. 1, you ought to desire the word of God, you ought to grow thereby, since you cannot deny but that you have tasted that the Lord is gracious. The next verse assures us that the Lord here spoken of is the Lord Jesus Christ. Hence,

Learn, 1. That our Lord Jesus Christ is very gracious to his people. He is in himself infinitely good; he is very kind, free, merciful to miserable sinners; he is pitiful and good to the undeserving; he hath in him a fulness of grace. 2. The graciousness of our Redeemer is best discovered by an experimental taste of it. There must be an immediate application of the object to the organ of taste. We cannot taste at a distance as we may see, and hear, and smell. To taste the graciousness of Christ experimentally supposeth our being united to him by faith, and then we may taste his goodness in all his providences, in all our spiritual concerns, in all our fears and temptations in his word and worship every day. ['That is to taste,' says Luther, 'when I with the heart believe that Christ has been sent for me, and is become mine own; that my miseries are his and his life mine. When this truth enters into the heart, then it is tasted.'] 3. The best of God's servants have in this life but a taste of the grace of Christ. A taste is but a little; it is not a draught, nor does it satisfy. It is so with the consolations of God in this life. 4. The word of God is the great instrument whereby he discovers and communicates his grace to men. They that feed upon the sincere milk of the word, they taste and experience most of his grace. In our converse with his word we should endeavour always to understand and experience more and more of his grace.

4 To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious,

The apostle here enters upon a description of Jesus Christ, which he continues to ver. 9; though to a capricious wit, or an infidel, the description of Christ by a stone may seem rough and harsh, yet to the Jews, who placed much of their religion in their magnificent temple, and who understood the prophetic style which calls the Messiah "a stone," Isa. viii. 14, xviii. 16, this manner of speaking was very elegant and proper. In this metaphorical description of Jesus Christ, he is called a stone to denote his invincible strength and everlasting duration, and to teach his servants that he is their protection and security, the foundation on which they are built, and a rock of offence to all their enemies. He is the "living stone," having eternal life in himself, and being the Prince of life to all his people.

[He is here called a living stone, not only because of his immortality and glorious resurrection, being a Lamb that was slain, and is alive for ever and ever, but because he is the principle of spiritual and eternal life to us,—a living foundation that transfuses its life into the whole building and every stone of it, "in whom," united to whom, "all the building is fully framed." It is the spirit that flows from him which enlivens it, and knits it together, not as a dead mass, but as "a living body." This foundation, from the peculiarity of the case, does for its living superstructure what the root does in the vegetable world to the trunk, the branches, and the leaves, and what the head or the heart in the animal body does to all the members.—L.]

The reputation and respect he hath with God and man is very different. He is "disallowed of men," reprobated or rejected by his own countrymen, the Jews, and by the generality of mankind; but chosen of God, separated and fore-ordained to be the foundation of the church, as ch. i. 20; and "precious," a most honourable, choice, worthy person, both in himself, in the esteem of God, and in the judgment of all that believe on him.

To this person so described we are obliged to come. "To whom coming," not by a local motion,—for that is impossible since his exaltation,—but by faith, whereby we are united to him at first, and draw nigh to him ever after.

Learn, 1. That Jesus Christ is the very foundation-stone of all our hopes and happiness. He communicates the true knowledge of God, Mat. xi. 27. By him we have access to the Father, Jno. xiv. 6; and through him are made partakers of all spiritual blessings, Eph. i. 3. 2. Men in general do disallow and reject Jesus Christ; they slight him, dislike him, oppose and refuse him, as Scripture and experience declare, Isa. liii. 3. 3. However Christ be disallowed by an ungrateful world, yet he is chosen of God, and precious in his account. He is chosen and fixed upon to be the Lord of the universe, the Head of the church, the Saviour of his people, and the Judge of the world. He is precious in the excellency of his nature, the dignity of his office, and the gloriousness of his services. 4. Those that expect mercy from this gracious Redeemer must come to him, which is our act, though done by God's grace; an act of the soul, not of the body; a real endeavour, not a fruitless wish.

5 Ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

The foundation was laid, ver. 4; here is the superstructure, the materials built upon it, "Ye also as living stones are built up." The apostle is recommending the Christian church and constitution to these dispersed Jews. It was natural for them to object that the Christian church had no such glorious temple, nor such a numerous priesthood; but its dispensation was mean, the services and sacrifices of it having nothing of that pomp and grandeur which the Jewish dispensation had. To which the apostle answers, that the Christian church is a much nobler fabric than the Jewish temple; it is a living temple, consisting not of dead materials, but of living parts. Christ, the foundation, is a living stone, and Christians are lively stones, and these make a spiritual house, and they are a holy priesthood; and though they have no bloody sacrifices of beasts to offer, yet they have much better and more acceptable, and they have an altar too on which to present their offerings; for they offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

Learn, 1. That all sincere Christians have in them a principle of spiritual life derived to them from Christ their head; therefore, as he is called a living stone, so they are called lively, or living stones; not dead in trespasses and sins, but alive to God by regeneration and the working of the Divine Spirit. 2. The church of God is "a spiritual house." The foundation is Christ, Eph. ii. 20; the builders are ministers, 1 Cor. iii. 10; the inhabitant is God, Eph. ii. 22. It is a house for its strength, beauty, variety of parts, and usefulness of the whole; it is spiritual in its foundation, Christ Jesus; in the materials of it, spiritual persons; in its furniture, the graces of the Spirit; in its connexion, being held together by the Spirit of God, and by one common faith; and in its use, which is spiritual work, to offer up spiritual sacrifices. This house is daily built up, every part of it improving, and the whole supplied in every age by the addition of new particular members. 3. All good Christians are "an holy priesthood." The apostle speaks here of the generality of Christians, and tells them they are a holy priesthood; they are all select persons, sacred to God, serviceable to others, well endowed with heavenly gifts and graces, and well employed. 4. This "holy priesthood" must, and will, offer up spiritual sacrifices to God. The spiritual sacrifices which Christians are to offer are their bodies, souls, affections, prayers, praises, alms, and other duties. 5. The most spiritual sacrifices of the best men are not acceptable to God but through Jesus Christ. He is the only great High Priest through whom we and our services can be accepted; therefore bring all your oblations to him, and by him present them to God.

6 Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.

What was asserted before of Christ,—his being "a living stone," &c.—is here proved from Isa. xxviii. 16, where observe the manner of the apostle's quoting Scripture, not by book, chapter, and verse, for those distinctions were not then made; so no more was said than a reference to Moses, David, or the prophets, except once a particular psalm was named, Acts xiii. 33. In their quotations they kept rather to the sense than the words of the Scripture, as appears from what is recited from the prophet in this place. He doth not quote the Scripture, either the Hebrew or Seventy, word for word, yet makes a just and true quotation. The true sense of Scripture may be justly and fully expressed in other than in Scripture words. "It is contained." The verb is active, but our translators render it passively, to avoid the difficulty of finding a nominative case for it, which had puzzled so many interpreters before them. The matter of the quotation is this, "Behold, I lay in Zion."

Learn, 1. In the weighty matters of religion we must depend entirely upon Scripture proof. Christ and his apostles appealed to Moses, David, and the ancient prophets. The word of God is the only rule God hath given us; it is a perfect and sufficient rule, and it is an intelligible and a certain rule. 2. The accounts that God hath given us in Scripture concerning his Son Christ Jesus are what require our strictest attention. "Behold, I lay." John calls for the as reasonable and guileless, that is, having only one object—to benefit the soul. This milk, doubtless, is "the word of God," but is not so expressed in the Greek. (Compare Wickliffe, Tyndal, Cranmer, Rheims, and Alford.) "This may truly be rendered 'reasonable milk,' as some read it, but certainly that reasonable milk is the word of God, 'the milk of the word'" (Leighton). "That ye may grow thereby unto salvation:" so all best MSS.

ii. 3. "Gracious:" chrēstos. "Wine is chrēstos, which has been

ii. 4, 5. "To whom coming:" the verb is present, implying a continual coming, a daily habit. "A living stone:" "as unto" of Authorised Version is incorrect, and must be omitted. "Peter, so named by Christ, from petra (a stone) delights in the metaphor of a stone, and teaches by his own example that all should be stones—i.e., like attention, Isa. i. 29. These demands of attention to Christ shew us the excellency of the matter, the importance of it, and our own stupidity and dullness. 3. The constituting Christ Jesus head of the church is an eminent work of God. "I lay in Zion." The setting up the pope for head of the church is a human contrivance, and an arrogant presumption. Christ only is the foundation and head of the church of God. 4. Jesus Christ is the chief corner-stone that God hath laid in his spiritual building. The corner-stone stays inseparably with the building, supports it, unites it, and adorns it; so does Christ by his holy church, his spiritual house. 5. Jesus Christ is a corner-stone for the support and salvation of none but such as are his sincere people. None but Zion, and such as of Zion; not for Babylon, not for his enemies. 6. True faith in Jesus Christ is the only way to prevent a man's utter confusion. Three things put a man into great confusion, and faith prevents them all—disappointment, sin, and judgment. Faith hath a remedy for each.

7 Unto you therefore which believe he is precious: but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner,

These words are an inference from what went before; Jesus Christ is said to be the chief corner-stone, &c. Hence the apostle infers,

First. With respect to good men: "To you, therefore, which believe, he is precious;" or 'he is an honour.' Christ is the crown and honour of a Christian; you that believe will be so far from being ashamed of him, that you will boast of him, and glory in him for ever.

Secondly. As to wicked men. The disobedient will go on to disallow and reject Jesus Christ; but God is resolved that he shall be, in despite of all opposition, the head of the corner.

Learn, 1. Whatever is by just and necessary consequence deduced from Scripture, may be depended upon with as much certainty as if it were contained in express words of Scripture. The apostle draws an inference from the prophet's testimony. The prophet did not expressly say so, but yet he said that from which the consequence was unavoidable. Our Saviour bids them "search the Scriptures," because they testified of him; and yet no place in those Scriptures to which he there refers them said that Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah. But yet those Scriptures do say, that he that would be born of a virgin, before the sceptre departed from Judah, during the second temple, and after Daniel's seventy weeks, was the Messiah: but such was Jesus Christ. To collect which conclusion, one must make use of reason, history, eyesight, experience; and yet it is an infallible Scripture conclusion for all that. 2. The business of a faithful minister is to apply general truths to the particular condition and state of their hearers. The apostle quotes a passage (ver. 6) out of the prophet, then he applies it severally to good and bad. This requires wisdom, courage, and fidelity; but it is very profitable to the hearers. 3. Jesus Christ is exceeding precious to all the faithful. The majesty and grandeur of his person, the dignity of his office, his near relation, his wonderful works, his immense love,—every thing engages the faithful to the highest esteem and respect to Jesus Christ. 4. Disobedient people have no true faith; by disobedient people, understand them that are unpersuadable, incredulous, and impenitent. These may have some right notions, but no solid faith. 5. They that ought to be builders of the church of Christ are often the worst enemies that Christ hath in the world. In the Old Testament the false prophets did the most mischief; and in the New Testament the greatest opposition and cruelty that Christ met with was from the scribes, Pharisees, chief priests, and those that pretended to build and take care of the church. Still the hierarchy of Rome is the worst enemy in the world to Jesus Christ and his interest. 6. God will carry on his own work, and support the interest of Jesus Christ in the world, notwithstanding the falseness of pretended friends and the opposition of his worst enemies.

8 And a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed.

The words are taken from Isa. viii. 13, 14, "Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and he shall be for a stone of stumbling, and for a rock of offence." From whence it is plain that Jesus Christ is the Lord of hosts, and consequently the Most High God. The builders, the chief priests, refused him, and the people followed their leaders; and so Christ became to them "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence," at which they stumbled and hurt themselves. And in return he fell upon them as a mighty stone or rock, and punished them with destruction; Mat. xxi. 44, "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

Learn, 1. All those that are disobedient take offence at the word of God. They "stumble at the word, being disobedient." They are offended with Christ himself, with his doctrine, and the purity of his precepts; but the Jewish doctors more especially stumbled at the meanness of his appearance, and the proposal of trusting only to him for their justification before God. They could not be brought to seek justification by faith, but as it were by the works of the law; "For they stumbled at that stumblingstone," Rom. ix. 32. 2. The same blessed Jesus, who is the author of salvation to some, is to others the occasion of their sin and destruction. He is set for the rising and fall of many in Israel. He is not the author of their sin, but only the occasion of it; their own disobedience makes them stumble at him, and reject him, which he punishes, as a Judge, with destruction. They that rejected him as a Saviour will split upon him as a Rock. 3. God himself hath appointed everlasting destruction to all those who "stumble at the word, being disobedient." All those that go on resolutely in their infidelity and contempt of the Gospel are appointed to eternal destruction; and God from eternity knows who they are. 4. To see the Jews generally rejecting Christ, and multitudes in all ages slighting him, ought not to discourage us in our love and duty to him. For this hath been foretold by the prophets long ago, and is a confirmation of our faith both in Scriptures and in the Messiah.

9 But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light:

The Jews were exceeding tender of their ancient privileges, of being the only people of God, taken into a special covenant with him, and separated from the rest of the world. Now, say they, if we submit to the gospel constitution, we shall lose all this, and stand upon the same level with the Gentiles. To this objection the apostle answers,

First. That if they did not submit they were ruined, ver. 7, 8.

Secondly. That if they did submit they should lose no real advantage, but continue still what they desired to be, "a chosen generation, a royal priesthood," &c.

Learn, 1. That all true Christians are "a chosen generation." They all make one family, a sort and species of people distinct from the common world, of another spirit, principle, and practice, which they could never be if they were not chosen in Christ to be such, and sanctified by his Spirit. 2. All the true servants of Christ are "a royal priesthood." They are royal in their relation to God and Christ, in their power with God, and over themselves and all their spiritual enemies. They are princely in the improvements and excellency of their own spirits, and in their hopes and expectations. They are "a royal priesthood," separated from sin and sinners, consecrated to God, and offering to God spiritual services and oblations acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. 3. All Christians, whosoever they be, compose one holy nation; they are one nation collected under one head; agreeing in the same manners and customs, and governed by the same laws. And they are "a holy nation," because consecrated and devoted to God, renewed and sanctified by his Holy Spirit. 4. It is the honour of the servants of Christ that they are God's "peculiar people." They are the people of his acquisition, choice, care, and delight. These four dignities of all genuine Christians are not natural to them, for their first state is a state of horrid darkness, but they are effectually "called out of darkness" into a state of "marvellous light," joy, pleasure, and prosperity, with this intent and view, that they should shew forth by words and actions the virtues and praises of him that hath called them.

[This light, this state of knowledge, purity, and happiness, is also termed marvellous, "God's marvellous," strange, wonderful "light." The light which emblematised it, the pillar of fire, was a marvellous light. It was supernatural, and so is this light. "It is the doing of the Lord, and it is marvellous" in the eyes of all who behold it. It produces marvellous effects, enabling us to see things invisible and eternal; and, by its brightness, casting into the shade things seen and temporal, it enables us to "see the King in his beauty, and to behold the land which is afar off." It enables us to penetrate into the true characters of objects, and to distinguish shadows from realities, and realities from shadows. It converts a spiritual waste into the garden of the Lord, blooming with beauty, rich in the fruits of righteousness.]

"Struck by that light, the human heart—

A barren soil no more—

Sends the sweet smell of grace abroad,

Where serpents lurk'd before,

The soul—a dreary province once

Of Satan's dark domain—

Feels a new empire form'd within,

And owns a heavenly reign."]

10 Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

To make this people content and thankful for the great mercies and dignities brought unto them by the Gospel, the apostle adviseth them to compare their former and their present state. Time was when they were not a people, nor had they obtained mercy, but were solemnly disclaimed and divorced, Jer. ii. 8; Hos. i. 6, 9; but now they are taken in again to be the people of God, and have obtained mercy.

Learn, 1. The best people ought frequently to look back upon what they were in time past. 2. The people of God are the most valuable people in the world; all the rest are not a people, good for little. 3. To be brought into the number of the people of God is a very great mercy, and it may be obtained.

[4. How different the state of the believer and the unbeliever; how happy the one, how miserable the other! Look at the two, and say if he who has secured the former has not reason to say that the Lord has been gracious to him for; there was no alternative. If he had not obtained the honour and happiness of the believer, the shame and ruin of the unbeliever must have been his.]

[5. If you be persuaded to be earnest suitors for this mercy, and to fly unto Jesus, who is the true mercy-seat, then be assured it is yours. Thou art nothing, and worse than nothing; true! but all that ever obtained this mercy were once so: they were nothing of all that which it hath made them to be; they were not a people, had no interest in God, were strangers to mercy, yea, heirs of wrath; yea, they had not so much as a desire after God, until this mercy prevented them, and showed itself to them, and them to themselves, and so moved them to desire it, and caused them to find it,—caught hold on them and plucked them out of the dungeon. And it is unquestionably still the same, and fails not; ever expending, and yet never all spent; yea, not so much as at all diminished; flowing as the rivers from one age to another, serving each age in the present, and yet no whit the less to those that come after. He who exercises it is the Lord, forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin to all that come unto him, and yet still keeping mercy for thousands that come after, Ex. xxxiv. 7.—L.]

11 Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul;

Even the best of men, the chosen generation, the people of God, need an exhortation to abstain from the worst sins, which the apostle here proceeds most earnestly and affectionately to warn them against. Knowing the difficulty, and yet the importance, of the duty, he useth his utmost interest in them: "Dearly beloved, I beseech you." The duty is to abstain from, and to suppress the first inclination or rise of, "fleshly lusts." There are many of them that proceed from the corruption of nature, which in their exercise depend upon the body, gratifying some sensual appetite or inordinate inclination of the flesh. These Christians ought to avoid, considering,

First. The respect they have with God and good men. They are "dearly beloved."

Secondly. Their condition in the world. They are "strangers and pilgrims," and should not impede their passage by giving into the wickedness and lusts of the country through which they pass.

Thirdly. The mischief and danger these sins do. They war against the soul; and therefore your souls ought to war against them.

Learn, 1. The grand mischief that sin does to man is this—it "wars against the soul;" it destroys the moral liberty of the soul; it weakens and debilitates the soul by impairing its faculties; it robs the soul of its comfort and peace; it living stones built upon Christ by faith" (Gerhard). "A spiritual house:" the Sinaitic MS. reads, "a house of the Spirit." "A holy priesthood:" "The adoption of these titles shows that in the Christian Church there is no need of the mediation of priests to present our prayers to God. Every true worshipper has access to God through Christ" (Webster and Wilkinson).

ii. 7. "He is precious;" Authorised Version here incorrect. "Is the honour" is the literal translation. The apostle has just quoted the words, "he that believeth in him shall not be ashamed," and now enforces them in his own language; the honour belonging to the stone with which believers are united is theirs by association and union. "Therefore honour to you that believe" (Wickliffe, and so Rheims and Alford).

ii. 8. "Who stumble, being disobedient to the word:" this is the true connection, not as Authorised Version. Thus the following sentence bears a different meaning, viz., that God has appointed debases and destroys the dignity of the soul, hinders its present prosperity, and plunges it into everlasting misery. 2. Of all sorts of sins, none more injurious to the soul than "fleshy lusts." Carnal appetites, lewdness, and sensuality, are most odious to God, and destructive to man's soul. It is a sore judgment to be given up to them.

12 Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles: that, whereas they speak against you as evildoers, they may by your good works, which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.

These Christian people are here exhorted to adorn their profession by an honest conversation. Their conversation, in every turn, every instance, and every action of their lives, ought to be honest; that is, good, lovely, decent, amiable, and without blame; and that because they lived among the Gentiles, people of another religion, and who were inveterate enemies to them, that did already slander them, and constantly speak evil of them as of evil-doers.

[The primitive Christians were very generally represented as monsters of wickedness, as guilty of the most unnatural and atrocious crimes, as atheists and haters of mankind. They were represented as cannibals, magicians, infanticides, and as indulging in the most shocking impurities at their nocturnal assemblies.—Just. Apolog. i. Ecumen. in loc. Euseb. iv. 7; v. 1. August. de Civ. Dei, xviii. 53.—B.]

A clean, just, good conversation, may not only stop their mouths, but may possibly be a means to bring them to glorify God, and turn to you, when they shall see you excel all others in good works. They now call you evil-doers,—vindicate yourselves by good works, and this is the way to convince them. There is a "day of visitation" coming, wherein God may call them by his word and his grace to repentance, and then they will glorify God, and applaud you for your excellent conversation, Lu. i. 68. When the Gospel shall come among them, and take effect, a good conversation will encourage them in their conversion, but an evil one will obstruct.

Note, 1. A Christian profession should be attended with an honest conversation, Phil. iv. 8. 2. It is the common lot of the best Christians to be evil spoken of by wicked men. 3. Those that are under God's gracious visitation do presently change their opinion of good people, glorifying God, and commending them whom before they railed at as evil-doers.

13 Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be to the king, as supreme; 14 Or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evildoers, and for the praise of them that do well.

The general rule of a Christian conversation is this, it must be honest, which it cannot be if there be not a conscientious discharge of all relative duties. The apostle does here begin to treat of those distinctly. Christians were not only reputed innovators in religion, but disturbers of the state. It was highly necessary the apostle should settle the rules and measures of obedience to the civil magistrate, which he does here. Where,

First. The duty required is submission, which contains loyalty and reverence to their persons, obedience to their just laws and commands, and subjection to legal penalties.

Secondly. The persons or objects to whom this submission is due are described. 1. More generally: "Every ordinance of man." Magistracy is certainly of Divine right; but the particular form of government, the power of the magistrate, and the persons who are to execute this power, are of human institution, and are governed by the laws and constitution of each particular country. And this is a general rule, binding in all nations, let the established form of government be what it will. (See additional Note on Rom. xiii. 1-6.) 2. Particularly: "To the king, as supreme," first in dignity and most eminent in degree; the king is a legal person, not a tyrant; "or unto governors," deputies, proconsuls, rulers of provinces, who "are sent by him," that is, commissioned by him to govern. 3. The reasons to enforce this duty are, 1st. It must be done for the "Lord's sake," who hath ordained magistracy for the good of mankind, who hath required obedience and submission, Rom. xiii., and whose honour is concerned in the dutiful behaviour of subjects to their sovereigns. 2nd. From the end and use of the magistrate's office, which is to punish evil-doers, and to praise and encourage all them that do well; they were appointed for the good of societies; and where this end is not pursued, the fault is not in their institution, but their practice.

Learn, 1. True religion is the best support of civil government; it requires submission "for the Lord's sake," and for conscience' sake. 2. All the punishments, and all the magistracies in the world, cannot hinder, but there will still be evil-doers in it. 3. The best way the magistrate can take to discharge his own office, and to amend the world, is to punish well [justly and impartially] and reward well.

15 For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men:

Here is another reason why Christians should submit to the civil magistrate, because it is "the will of God," and consequently their duty; and because it is the way to put to silence the malicious slanders of ignorant and foolish men.

Learn, 1. "The will of God" is to a good man the strongest reason for any duty. 2. Obedience to magistrates is a considerable branch of a Christian's duty; "So is the will of God." 3. A Christian must endeavour in all relations to behave himself so as to put to silence the unreasonable reproaches of the most ignorant and foolish men. 4. Those that speak against religion and religious people are ignorant and foolish.

16 As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God.

The Jews, from Deu. xvii. 15, concluded that they were bound to obey no sovereign but one taken from among their own brethren; and the converted Jews thought they were free from subjection by their relation to Christ. To prevent these mistakes, the apostle tells the Christians that they were free; but from what? not from duty and obedience to God's law, which requires subjection to the civil magistrate. They were free spiritually from the bondage of sin and Satan, and the ceremonial law; but they must not make their Christian liberty a cloak or covering for any wickedness, or the neglect of any duty towards God, or towards their superiors; but must still remember they were "the servants of God."

[It intimates that, being set at liberty by Christ they are not to enthrall themselves to any creature, however elevated; nor to submit to any human institution as slaves, as if the ordinance or institution itself, as a human ordinance and institution, did, by any inherent power, bind the conscience; but that, as the Lord's freemen, in a manner becoming so exalted a character, they should yield a cheerful subjection to the power of civil magistrates, and a ready obedience to their lawful commands, from a regard to the authority of Christ, the sole Lord of their conscience, requiring them so to do,—taking heed "not to use their liberty for an occasion to the flesh," not making that a cloak or excuse for disrespect or disobedience to their civil superiors; for though, in the highest sense of the term, they be not the servants of men, but of God, and therefore are not bound to obey any human command without a reference to the authority of God requiring them to do so; yet, on the ground of his command to be subject to the higher powers, they are bound to yield to them such honour and obedience as does not interfere with the supreme reverence and obedience which they owe to him as the only Lord of the conscience.—Bp. Sanderson, as quoted by Dr. Brown.]

Learn, 1. All the servants of Christ are free men, Jno. viii. 36. They are free from Satan's dominion, the law's condemnation, the wrath of God, the uneasiness of duty,—[meaning that they find duty not burdensome, but pleasant; the yoke is easy to them, the burden light; see 1 Jno. v. 4, 5],—and the terrors of death. 2. The servants of Jesus Christ ought to be very careful not to abuse their Christian liberty; they must not make it a cover or cloak for any wickedness against God, or disobedience to superiors.

17 Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king.

The apostle concludes his discourse, concerning the duty of subjects, with four admirable precepts.

First. "Honour all men." A due respect is to be given to all men. The poor are not to be despised, Pr. xvii. 5. The wicked must be honoured, not for their wickedness, but for any other qualities, such as wit, prudence, courage, eminency of employment, or the hoary head. Abraham, Jacob, Samuel, the prophets and apostles, never scrupled to give due honour to bad men.

[The Romans, when they meant to set a mark of public disgrace or dishonour on any eminent person, did manifest their intention by throwing down, breaking, trampling upon, or doing some other like disgrace to their statues or pictures; and Solomon, in sundry places, interpreteth all acts of oppressing, mocking, or otherwise despising our neighbours, not without a strong reflection upon God himself; as leading to the contempt and dishonour of their Maker. "He that oppresseth the poor reproacheth his Maker; but he that honoureth him hath mercy on the poor." "Whoso mocketh the poor reproacheth his Maker;" and surely there is much force in this interrogation, "Why settest thou at nought, not only thine own brother, but the brother of the Lord of glory?" Why despisest thou him for whom Christ died? Pr. xiv. 31; xvii. 5; Rom. xiv. 10, 15.—Sanderson. The sentiment of honour for man should manifest itself in the whole of our conduct to our fellow-men, especially to those who in any respect may be our inferiors, whether in intellect, or talent, or acquirement, or moral worth, or rank, or wealth, leading us to "condescend to them that are of low estate;" but it takes its best form when it leads us to use all the means in our power to raise our fellow-men in the scale of true honour and excellence; to rescue them from the influence of ignorance, and error, and superstition; to put down slavery, oppression, war, and misgovernment, in all its endlessly varied forms; to make men free, intelligent, industrious, moral, religious, and happy, to the greatest attainable degree on earth; to save them from the shame and everlasting contempt which awaits unimproved advantages and unanswered responsibilities in eternity; and to secure to them that "glory, honour, and immortality" which, while "the gift of God through Jesus Christ," is to be sought for and obtained "in a constant continuance in well-doing." Rom. vi. 23; xi. 7.—B. See Note on Jas. i. 27.]

Secondly. "Love the brotherhood." All Christians are a fraternity, united to Christ the head, alike disposed and qualified, nearly related, in the same interest, having communion one with another, and going to the same home, and therefore should love one another with an especial affection.

Thirdly. "Fear God," with the highest reverence, duty, and submission. If this be wanting, none of the other three duties can be performed as they ought.

Fourthly. "Honour the king," with that highest honour that is peculiarly due to him above other men.

18 Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.

The case of servants wanted an apostolical determination as well as that of subjects; for they imagined that their Christian liberty did set them free from their unbelieving and cruel masters. To this the apostle answers, "Servants, be subject." By "servants" he means those that were strictly such, whether hired or bought with money, or taken in the wars, or born in the house, or those that serve by contract for a limited time, as apprentices. These he orders to "be subject," to do their business faithfully and honestly; to carry themselves as inferiors ought, with reverence and affection, and to submit patiently to hardships and inconveniences. This subjection they owe to their masters, who have a right to their service, and that "not only to the good and gentle," such as do use them well, and abate somewhat of their right, but even to the crooked and perverse, who are scarce to be pleased at all.

Learn, 1. Servants ought to carry themselves to their masters with submission and fear of displeasing them. 2. The sinful miscarriage of one relation does not justify the sinful behaviour of the other; the servant is bound to his duty, though the master be sinfully froward and perverse. 3. Good people are meek and gentle to their servants and inferiors.

19 For this is thankworthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. 20 For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.

that those who disobey his word shall stumble—i.e., incur punishment; whereas the Authorised Version might mean that God had appointed men to disobedience.

ii. 11—iv. 6. So far the apostle has been exhorting believers to make their life worthy of their high calling, as distinguished from their former mode of life; now he exhorts them to glorify God amongst the ungodly by holy living.

ii. 12. "Whereas:" rather, "in the matter in which"—that is, in their Christian course of action. "In that thing that they backbite of you" (Wickliffe). "In that wherein they misreport of you" (Rheims). The very acts which, as Christians, they must do, and which would at first offend the heathen, would, when carefully considered by them, redound to God's praise. Thus Tertullian mentions that the Christians would not frequent the amphitheatres, gave up slaves, nursed the heathen sick when their relatives had deserted them, were imprisoned, but for their faith, not for crime; all which things,

Our holy apostle shews his love and concern for the souls of poor servants, as well as for higher people. Herein he ought to be imitated by all inferior ministers, who should distinctly apply their counsels to the lower, the meaner, the younger, and the poorer sort of their hearers, as well as others. Having charged them to be subject, he condescends to reason with them about it. If they were patient under their hardships, while they suffered unjustly, and continued doing their duty to their unbelieving and untoward masters, this would be acceptable to God, and he would reward all that they suffered for conscience towards him. But to be patient when they were justly chastised, this deserves no commendation at all. It is only doing well, and suffering patiently for that, which is "acceptable with God."

Learn, 1. There is no condition so mean but a man may live conscientiously in it, and glorify God in it. The meanest servant may do so. 2. The most conscientious persons are very often the greatest sufferers. For conscience towards God they suffer wrongfully; they do well, and suffer for it. But these sort of sufferers are praiseworthy; they do honour to God and to religion, and they are accepted of him; and this is their highest support and satisfaction. 3. Deserved sufferings must be endured with patience. If ye are "buffeted for your faults," ye must "take it patiently." Sufferings in this world are not always pledges of our future happiness. If children or servants are rude and undutiful, and suffer for it, it will neither be "acceptable with God" nor procure the praise of men.

21 For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps:

More reasons are given to encourage Christian servants to patience under unjust sufferings.

First. From their Christian calling and profession: "Hereunto were ye called."

Secondly. From the example of Christ, who suffered for us, and so became our example, that we should follow his steps. From whence,

Learn, 1. That good Christians are a sort of people called to be sufferers, and therefore they must expect it. By the terms of Christianity they are bound to deny themselves, and take up the cross. They are called by the commands of Christ, by the dispensations of Providence, by the preparations of Divine grace; and by the practice of Jesus Christ they are bound to suffer when thus called to it. 2. Jesus Christ suffered for you, or for us; it was not the Father that suffered, but he whom the Father sanctified and sent into the world for that end. It was both the body and soul of Christ that suffered; and he suffered for us, in our stead, and for our good, ver. 24. 3. The sufferings of Christ should quiet us under the most unjust and cruel sufferings we meet with in the world. He suffered voluntarily,—not for himself, but for us,—with the utmost readiness, with perfect patience, from all quarters; and all this, though he was God-man. Shall not we sinners, that deserve the worst, submit to the light afflictions of this life, which work for us unspeakable advantages afterwards?

22 Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: 23 Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously:

The example of Christ's subjection and patience is here explained and amplified. Christ suffered,

First. Wrongfully, and without cause; for he "did no sin," Isa. liii. 9. He had done no violence, no injustice or wrong to any one; he wrought no iniquity of any sort whatever, "neither was guile found in his mouth;" his words, as well as actions, were all sincere, just, and right.

Secondly. Patiently: "When he was reviled, he reviled not again." When they blasphemed him, mocked him, called him foul names, he was dumb, and opened not his mouth. When they went farther, to real injuries,—beating, buffeting, and crowning him with thorns,—he threatened not; but committed both himself and his cause to God, "that judgeth righteously," who would in time clear his innocence, and avenge him on his enemies.

Learn, 1. Our blessed Redeemer was perfectly holy, and so free from sin that no temptation, no provocation whatsoever, could extort from him so much as the least sinful or indecent word. 2. Provocations to sin can never justify the commission of it. The rudeness, cruelty, and injustice of enemies will not justify Christians in reviling and revenge. The reasons for sin can never be so great but we have always stronger reasons to avoid it. 3. The judgment of God will determine justly upon every man and every cause, and thither we ought with patience and resignation to refer ourselves.

24 Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed.

Least any should think, from what is said, ver. 21—23, that Christ's death was designed only for an example of patience under sufferings, the apostle here adds a more glorious design and effect of it; "Who his own self," &c. Where note,

First. The person suffering: Jesus Christ, "his own self, in his own body." The expression, "his own self," is emphatical, and necessary to shew that he verified all the ancient prophecies, to distinguish him from the Levitical priests, who offered the blood of others; but he by himself purged our sins, Heb. i. 3, and to exclude all others from participation with him in the work of man's redemption. It is added, "in his body." Not but that he suffered in his soul, Mat. xxvi. 38; but the sufferings of the soul were inward and concealed, when those of the body were visible, and more obvious to the consideration of those suffering servants for whose sake the example is produced.

Secondly. The sufferings he underwent were stripes, wounds, and death, the death of the cross—servile and ignominious punishments!

"He himself bare our sins in his own body to the tree," Ερι το ξυλον. Vide Robinson on Epi. iii. 6, (a) and (β); Mat. iii. 13; xii. 28; xxii. 34; Acts iv. 26; Lu. iii. 2; 2 Thes. i. 10; 1 Pet. iii. 12: see Dr. Brown's illustration of this rendering, ii. 97, et seq. It is the same word that in the verse before us is rendered on, that in the following verse is rendered to, "Ye are returned to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls." This, then, we apprehend, is the apostle's statement, "He himself bare our sins in his own body to the tree."—B.]

Thirdly. The reason of his sufferings. He "bare our sins;" which teaches, 1. That Christ in his suffering stood charged with our sins, as one that had undertaken to put them away by the sacrifice of himself, Isa. liii. 6. 2. That he bare the punishment of them, and thereby satisfied Divine justice. 3. That thereby he takes away our sins, and removes them away from us, as the scape-goat did typically bear the sins of the people on his head, and then carried them quite away, Lev. xvi. 21, 22. So the Lamb of God does first "bear our sins in his own body," and thereby "take away the sin of the world," Jno. i. 29.

Fourthly. The fruits of Christ's sufferings are, 1. Our sanctification; consisting of the death, the mortification of sin, and a new, holy life of righteousness; for both which we have an example, and powerful motives and abilities also, from the death and resurrection of Christ. 2. Our justification. Christ was bruised and crucified as an expiatory sacrifice, and by his stripes we are healed.

Learn, 1. Jesus Christ bore the sins of all his people, and expiated them by his death upon the cross. 2. No man can depend safely upon Christ, as having borne his sin and expiated his guilt, till he dies unto sin and lives unto righteousness. [Meaning that a death unto sin, and a new life to righteousness, is the unfailing attendant of saving faith in Christ, and that the evidence of the latter is afforded in our experience of Divine grace producing the former.]

25 For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls.

The apostle concludes his advice to Christian servants, putting them in mind of the difference between their former and present condition.

First. They "were as sheep going astray;" which represents, 1. Man's sin; he goes "astray." It is his own act; he is not driven, but does voluntarily go astray. 2. His misery. He goes astray from the pasture, from the Shepherd, and from the flock, and so exposes himself to innumerable dangers.

Secondly. Here is the recovery of these by conversion; "But are now returned." The word is passive, and shews that the return of a sinner is the effect of Divine grace. This return is from all their errors and wanderings to Christ, who is the true, careful Shepherd that loves his sheep, and laid down his life for them; who is the most vigilant pastor, and bishop, or overseer of souls.

Learn, 1. Sinners, before their conversion, are always "going astray;" their life is a continued error. 2. Jesus Christ is the supreme "Shepherd and Bishop of souls," who is always resident with his flock, and watchful over them. 3. Those that expect the love and care of this universal Pastor must return to him; must die unto sin, and live unto righteousness.

CHAPTER III.

Wherein the apostle describes the duties of husbands and wives one to another, beginning with the duty of the wife, ver. 1—7. He exhorts Christians to unity, love, compassion, peace, and patience under sufferings; to oppose the slanders of their enemies, not by returning evil for evil, or railing for railing, but by a blessing; by a ready account of their faith and hope, and by keeping a good conscience, ver. 8—17. To encourage them to this, he propothes the example of Christ, who suffered, the just for the unjust; but yet punished the old world for their disobedience, and saved the few that were faithful in the days of Noah, ver. 18—22.

LIKEWISE, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that, if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives; 2 While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear.

The apostle, having treated of the duties of subjects to their sovereigns, and

ii. 15. "Ignorance of foolish men:" "Not simple ignorance of this or that fact, but a state of lack of knowledge or understanding, habitual ignorance" (Alford). See 1 Cor. xv. 34.

ii. 16. "Maliciousness" possibly here means a readiness to rebel against earthly rulers, on the plea of the service of Christ.

ii. 21. "For you, leaving you:" so best MSS.

iii. 1. Omit "also." "They shall be won without word:" so best MSS. "Without word," or "without the word," are equally correct though at first liable to misconstruction, through prejudice or hasty judgment, would be approved on careful consideration. "The day of visitation;" this is generally understood to mean the day of grace, during which God offers mercy to man, though some think it refers to the day of inquisition before earthly magistrates, and some to the day of judgment.

ii. 13. "For the Lord's sake:" his honour is concerned in the behaviour of his followers.

of servants to their masters, he comes now to explain the duty of wives to their husbands; for fear the Christian matrons should imagine that their conversion to Christ, and their interest in all Christian privileges, did exempt them from subjection to their pagan or Jewish husbands. The apostle here tells them that the duty of wives consists,

First, "In subjection," or a loving submission to the will, and obedience to the just authority, of their own husbands; which obliging carriage would be the most likely way to win those disobedient and unbelieving husbands who had rejected the word, or who attended to no other evidence of the truth of it but what they saw in the prudent, peaceable, and exemplary conversation of their wives.

Secondly, In a "chaste conversation," which their unbelieving husbands would accurately observe and attend to.

Learn, 1. Every distinct relation hath its particular duties, which ministers ought to preach, and the people ought to understand. 2. A cheerful subjection, and a loving, reverential respect, are duties which Christian women owe their husbands, whether they be good or bad. These were due from Eve to Adam, before the fall, and are still required, though much more difficult now than they were before, Gen. iii. 16; 1 Tim. ii. 11. 3. Though the design of the word of the Gospel is to win and gain souls to Christ Jesus, yet there are many so obstinate that they will not be won by the word. 4. There is nothing more powerful, next to the word of God, to win people than a good conversation, and the careful discharge of relative duties. 5. Irreligion and infidelity doth not dissolve the bonds, nor dispense with the duties, of civil relations. The wife must discharge her duty to her own husband, though he "obey not the word." 6. Evil men are strict observers of the conversation of the professors of religion; their curiosity, envy, and jealousy make them watch narrowly the ways and lives of good people. 7. A "chaste conversation," attended with due and proper respect to every one, is an excellent means to win them to the faith of the Gospel and obedience to the word.

3 Whose adorning let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel;

1. Greek Virgin. 2. Greek Matron. 3. Roman Virgin. 4. Roman Matron.
GREEK AND ROMAN FEMALES.

This rule relates to the dress of religious women. Here are three sorts of ornaments forbidden: "Plaiting the hair," which was commonly used in those times by lewd women. "Wearing of gold," or ornaments made of gold, was practised by Rebecca and Esther, and other religious women, but afterwards became the attire chiefly of abandoned women and wicked people. "Putting on of apparel" is not absolutely forbidden, but only too much curiosity and costliness in apparel.

Learn, 1. Religious people should take care that all their external behaviour be answerable to their profession of Christianity; they must be holy in all manner of conversation. 2. The "outward adorning" of the body is very often sinful and excessive. For instance, when it is immoderate, and above your degree and station in the world; when you are proud of it, and puffed up with it; when you dress, designing to allure and tempt others; when your apparel is too rich, curious, or superfluous; when your fashions are fantastical, imitating the levity and vanity of the worst people; and when they are immodest and wanton. The attire of a harlot can never become a chaste Christian matron.

[Such excessive costliness both argues and feeds the pride of the heart, and defrauds, if not others of their dues, yet the poor of their charity, which in God's sight is a due debt, too; and far more comfort shall I have on my death-bed to remember that at such a time, instead of putting lace on my own clothes, I helped a naked back to clothing; I abated somewhat of my former superfluities to supply the poor with necessities;—far sweeter will this be than to remember that I could needlessly cast out many pounds to serve my pride, while I grudged a penny to relieve the poor.—L.] There is still another hint which this negative injunction is intended and fitted to give. That dress should not occupy an undue share of the attention and time of Christian wives. The apostle intimates that it is a very subordinate thing. No Christian woman will suffer the adorning of her body to be either her business or her delight. She will not render herself responsible at the bar of God for the work of hours, days, weeks, months, in a long life of years, which might, which ought to, have been otherwise and more worthily employed; in a way more becoming rational, responsible, immortal beings.—B.]

4 But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

translations, but it seems preferable to drop "the," and understand the apostle to mean that the conduct of the wives, without exhortations, shall win the unbelieving husbands, rather than that they should be won without "the word" (of God), especially as the wives' conduct would be a living testimony to the goodness of that word, and arise from its teaching.

iii. 4. "Meek and quiet:" "Gentle, one who does not make disturbance; quiet, one who calmly bears the disturbances of others."

Instead of the outward adorning of the body, the apostle directs Christian wives to put on much more excellent and beautiful ornaments. Where note,

First. The part to be adorned: "The hidden man of the heart;" that is, the soul; the hidden, the inner man. Take care to adorn and beautify your souls rather than your bodies.

Secondly. The ornaments prescribed. It must, in general, be something not corruptible that beautifies the soul; that is, the graces and virtues of God's holy Spirit. The ornaments of the body are destroyed by the moth, and perish in the using; but the grace of God, the longer we wear it, the brighter and better it is. More especially, the finest ornament of Christian women is "a meek and quiet spirit;" a tractable, easy temper of mind, void of passion, pride, and immoderate anger; discovering itself in a quiet, obliging behaviour towards their husbands and families. If the husband be harsh, and averse to religion, (which was the case of these good wives to whom the apostle gives this direction,) there is no way so likely to win him as a prudent, meek behaviour. However, a quiet spirit will make a good woman easy to herself, which, being visible to others, becomes an amiable ornament to a person in the eyes of the world.

Thirdly. The excellency of it. This meekness and calmness of spirit is "in the sight of God of great price." It is amiable in the sight of men, and precious in the sight of God.

Learn, 1. A true Christian's chief care lies in the right ordering and commanding of his own spirit. Where the hypocrite's work ends, there the true Christian's work begins. 2. The endowments of the inner man are the chief ornaments of a Christian; but especially a composed, calm, and quiet spirit renders either man or woman beautiful and lovely.

5 For after this manner in the old time the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands: 6 Even as Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

The duties of Christian wives being in their nature difficult, the apostle enforceth them by the example,

First. Of the holy women of old who trusted in God. You can pretend nothing of excuse from the weakness of your sex but what they might. They lived in old time, and had less knowledge to inform them, and fewer examples to encourage them; yet in all ages they practised this duty. They were holy women, and therefore their example is obliging; they "trusted in God," and yet did not neglect their duty to man. The duties imposed upon you of a quiet spirit, and of subjection to your own husband, are not new, but what have ever been practised by the greatest and best women in the world.

Secondly. Of Sarah, who obeyed her husband, and followed him when he went from Ur of the Chaldeans, not knowing whither he went, and called him lord, thereby shewing him reverence, and acknowledging his superiority over her; and all this though she was declared a princess by God from heaven, by the change of her name,—"whose daughters ye are," if you imitate her in faith and good works, and do not, through fear of your husbands, either quit the truth you profess, or perform your duty to them, but readily perform it, without either fear or force, out of conscience towards God and sense of duty to them.

Learn, 1. God takes exact notice, and keeps an exact record, of the actions and carriage of all men and women in the world. 2. The subjection of wives to their husbands is a duty which hath been practised universally by holy women in all ages. 3. The greatest honour of any man or woman lies in a humble and faithful deportment of themselves, in the relation or condition in which Providence hath placed them. 4. God takes notice of the good that is in his servant to their honour and benefit, but covers a multitude of failings. Sarah's infidelity and derision is overlooked when her virtues are celebrated. 5. Christians ought to do their duty to one another, not out of fear, nor from force, but from a willing mind, and in obedience to the command of God. Wives should be in subjection to their churlish husbands, not from dread and amazement, but from a desire to do well, and to please God.

7 Likewise, ye husbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

The husband's duty to the wife comes next to be considered, the particulars whereof are,

First. Cohabitation; which forbids unnecessary separation, and implies a mutual communication of goods and persons, one to another, with delight and concord.

Secondly. Dwelling with the wife "according to knowledge;" not according to lust, as brutes, nor according to passion, as devils, but according to knowledge, as wise and sober men, that know the word of God and their own duty.

Thirdly. "Giving honour to the wife." Giving due respect unto her, and maintaining her authority; protecting her person, supporting her credit, delighting in her conversation, affording a handsome maintenance, and placing a due trust and confidence in her. The reasons are, because she is the weaker vessel, by nature and constitution, and so ought to be defended. But then the wife is, in other and higher respects, equal to her husband; they are "heirs together of the grace of life," of all the blessings of this life and another; and therefore should live peaceably and quietly one with another, which, if they do not, their prayers one with another, and one for another, will be hindered; so that often you will not pray at all, or if you do, you will pray with a discomposed, ruffled mind, and so without success.

Learn, 1. The weakness of the female sex is no just reason either for separation or contempt, but, on the contrary, it is a reason for honour and respect; "Giving honour to the wife as unto the weaker vessel." 2. There is an honour due to all that are "heirs of the grace of life." 3. All married people should take care to behave themselves so lovingly and peaceably one to another that they may not by their broils hinder the success of their prayers.

8 Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion

iii. 6. "Afraid with any amazement:" "afraid of every shadow" (Tyndal). So afraid of the anger of their husbands as to deny Christ, or act in opposition to his commands.

iii. 7. "The apostle prescribes two things: 1, consideration for the wife, as of the weaker sex; 2, honour for the wife, as a fellow-heir of the grace of life" (Alford).

iii. 10. The sense of "will love life" may be, as Alford suggests, "he that loves life, and wishes to continue to do so."

one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous:

The apostle does here pass from special to more general exhortations. He advises Christians to be all of one mind, to be unanimous in the belief of the same faith and practice of the same duties of religion. And whereas the Christians at that time were, many of them, in a suffering condition, therefore he charges them to have compassion one of another, to "love as brethren," to pity those that were in distress, and to "be courteous" to all. Hence,

Learn, 1. Christians should endeavour to be all of one mind in the great points of faith, in real affection, and in Christian practice. They should be like-minded one to another, according to Christ Jesus, Rom. xv. 5; not according to man's pleasure, but God's word. 2. Though Christians cannot be exactly of the same mind, yet they should have "compassion one of another," and "love as brethren." They ought not to persecute or hate one another, but love one another with more than common affection. They should "love as brethren." 3. Christianity requires pity to the distressed, and civility to all. He must be a flagrant sinner, or a vile apostate, that is not a proper object of civil courtesy, 1 Cor. v. 11; 2 Jno. 10, 11.

9 Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.

The former direction teacheth us how Christians and friends should treat one another; this verse instructs us how to behave towards enemies. The apostle knew that Christians would be hated and evil entreated of all men for Christ's sake; therefore he warns them not to return "evil for evil, or railing for railing;" but, on the contrary, when they rail at you, do you bless them. When they give you evil words, do you give them good ones; for Christ hath, both by his word and example, called you to "bless them that curse you," and hath settled a blessing on you, as your everlasting inheritance, though you were unworthy. To bear evils patiently, and to bless your enemies, is the way to obtain this blessing of God.

Learn, 1. To render evil for evil, or railing for railing, is a sinful, unchristian practice. The magistrate may punish evil-doers, and private men may seek a legal remedy when they are wronged, but private revenge by duelling, scolding, or secret mischief, is forbidden, Pr. xx. 22; Lu. vi. 27; Rom. xii. 17; 1 Thes. v. 15. To rail is to revile another in bitter, fierce, and reproachful terms; but for ministers to rebuke sharply, and to preach earnestly, against the sins of the times, is not railing; all the prophets and apostles practised it, Isa. lvi. 10; Zeph. iii. 3; Acts xx. 29. 2. The laws of Christ oblige us to return blessing for railing; "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that persecute you," Mat. v. 44. You must not justify them in their sin, but you must do for your enemies all that justice requires or charity commands. We must pity, pray for, and love them that rail at us. 3. A Christian's calling, as it invests him with glorious privileges, so it obligeth him to difficult duties. 4. All the true servants of God shall infallibly inherit a blessing. They have it already in a great degree, but the full possession of it is reserved to another state and world.

10 For he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile: 11 Let him eschew evil, and do good; let him seek peace, and ensue it.

We have here an excellent prescription for a comfortable, happy life, in this quarrelsome, ill-natured world, taken from Ps. xxxiv. 12-14. If you earnestly desire that your life should be long, and your days peaceable and prosperous, keep your tongue from reviling, evil-speaking, and slandering, and your lips from lying, deceit, and dissimulation. Avoid doing any real damage or hurt to your neighbour, but be ever ready to do good, and to overcome evil with good. Seek peace with all men, and pursue it, though it retire from you. This will be the best way to dispose people to speak well of you, and live peaceably with you.

Learn, 1. That good people, under the Old and New Testament, were obliged to the same moral duties. To refrain the tongue from evil, and the lips from guile, was a duty in David's time as well as now. 2. It is lawful to consider temporal advantages as motives and encouragements to religion. 3. The practice of religion, particularly the right government of the tongue, is the best way to make this life comfortable and prosperous. A sincere, inoffensive, discreet tongue, is a singular means to pass us peaceably and comfortably through the world. 4. The avoiding of evil and doing of good is the way to contentment and happiness both here and hereafter. 5. It is the duty of Christians not only to embrace peace when it is offered, but to seek and pursue it when it is denied. Peace with societies, and peace with particular persons, in opposition to division and contention, is what is here intended.

12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil.

The allegation is continued from the 34th psalm. Christians need not fear that such patient, inoffensive behaviour as is prescribed, ver. 10, 11, will invite and encourage the cruelty of their enemies, for God will thereby be engaged on their side; "For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous." He taketh special notice of them, and exercises a providential, constant government over them, and bears a special respect and affection to them; "His ears are open to their prayers." So that if any injuries be offered to them, they have this remedy, they may complain of it to their heavenly Father, whose ears are always attentive to the prayers of his servants in their distresses, and who will certainly aid them against their unrighteous enemies; "But the face of the Lord is against them that do evil;" his anger, and displeasure, and revenge, will pursue them; for he is more an enemy to wicked persecutors than men are.

Learn, 1. That we must not in all cases adhere to the express words of Scripture, but study the sense and meaning of them, otherwise we shall be led into blasphemous errors and absurdities. We must not imagine that God hath eyes, and ears, and face, though these are the express words of Scripture. 2. God hath a special care and paternal affection towards all his righteous people. 3. God doth always hear the prayers of the faithful, Jno. ix. 31; 1 Jno. v. 14; Heb. iv. 16. 4. Though God is infinitely good, yet he abhorreth impenitent sinners, and will pour out his wrath upon them that do evil. He will do himself right, and do all the world justice; and his goodness is no obstruction to his doing so.

13 And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? 14 But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye: and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled;

The patient, humble behaviour of Christians, recommended above, is here urged again, from two considerations:—

First. This will be the best and surest way to prevent suffering, for "who is he that will harm you?" This, I suppose, is spoken of Christians in an ordinary condition, not in the heat of persecution. Ordinarily there will be but few so diabolical and impious as to harm them that live so innocently and usefully as you do.

Secondly. This is the way to improve sufferings. "If you be followers of that which is good," and yet suffer, this is suffering for righteousness' sake, and that will be your glory and your happiness, as it entitles you to the blessing promised by Christ, Mat. v. 10. Therefore you need not be afraid of anything they can do to strike you with terror, neither be much troubled or concerned about the rage or force of your enemies.

Learn, 1. To follow always that which is good is the best course we can take to keep out of harm's way. 2. To suffer for righteousness' sake is the honour and happiness of a Christian; to suffer for the cause of truth, a good conscience, or any part of a Christian's duty, is a great honour; the delight of it is greater than the torment, the honour more than the disgrace, and the gain much greater than the loss. 3. Christians have no reason to be afraid of the threats or rage of any of their enemies. Your enemies are God's enemies; his face is against them, his power is above them; they are the objects of his curse, and can do nothing to you but by his permission; therefore trouble not yourselves about them.

15 But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear:

Instead of terrifying yourselves with the fear of men, be sure to "sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; let him be your fear, and let him be your dread," Isa. viii. 12, 13. "Fear not them that can only kill the body, but fear him that can destroy body and soul," Lu. xii. 4, 5. We sanctify the Lord God in our hearts when we, with sincerity and fervency, adore him; when our thoughts of him are awful and reverent; when we rely upon his power, trust unto his faithfulness, submit to his wisdom, imitate his holiness, and give him the glory due to his most illustrious perfections. We sanctify God before others when our deportment is such as invites and encourages others to glorify and honour him; both are required, Lev. x. 3. When this principle is laid deep into your hearts, the next thing as to men is to be always ready, that is, able and willing to give an answer, or make an apology or defence of the faith you profess, and that to "every man that asketh a reason of your hope,"—what sort of hope you have for which you suffer such hardships in the world.

Learn, 1. An awful sense of the Divine perfections is the best antidote against the fear of sufferings. Did we fear God more we should certainly fear men less. 2. That the hope and faith of a Christian is defensible against all the world. There may be a good reason given for religion; it is not a fancy, but a rational scheme, revealed from heaven, suited to all the necessities of miserable sinners, and centering entirely in the glory of God through Jesus Christ. 3. Every Christian is bound to answer and apologise for the hope that is in him. Christians should have a reason ready for their Christianity, that it may appear they are not actuated either by folly or fancy. This defence may be necessary more than once or twice, so that Christians should be always prepared to make it, either to the magistrate, if he demand it, or to any inquisitive, serious Christian that desires to know it, for his information or improvement. 4. These confessions of our faith ought to be made with meekness and fear; apologies for our religion ought to be made with modesty and meekness, in the fear of God, with jealousy over ourselves and reverence to our superiors.

16 Having a good conscience; that, whereas they speak evil of you, as of evildoers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ. 17 For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing, than for evil doing.

The confession of a Christian's faith cannot credibly be supported but by the two means here specified, a good conscience and a good conversation. Conscience is good when it does its office well; when it is kept pure, and uncorrupted, and clear from guilt, then it will justify you, though men accuse you. A "good conversation in Christ" is a holy life, according to the [grace] doctrine and example of Christ. Look well to your conscience and to your conversation, and then, though men "speak evil of you, and falsely accuse you, as evil-doers," you will clear yourselves and bring them to shame. Perhaps you may think it hard to suffer for well-doing, for keeping a good conscience and a good conversation; but be not discouraged, for it is better for you, though worse for your enemies, that you suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing.

Learn, 1. That the most conscientious persons cannot escape the censures and slanders of evil men. They will speak evil of them as of evil-doers, and charge them with crimes which their very souls abhor. Christ and his apostles were so used. 2. A good conscience and a good conversation are the best means to secure a good name; these give a solid reputation and a lasting one. 3. False accusation generally turns to the accuser's shame, by discovering at last the accuser's indiscretion, injustice, falsehood, and uncharitableness. 4. It is sometimes the will of God that good people should suffer for well-doing, for their honesty, and for their faith. 5. As well-doing does sometimes expose a good man to suffering, so evil-doing will not exempt an evil man from it. The apostle supposeth here that a man may suffer for both. If the sufferings of good people for well-doing be so severe, what will the sufferings of wicked people be for evil-doing? It is a sad condition that person is in upon whom sin and suffering meet together at the same time. Sin makes sufferings to be extreme, unprofitable, comfortless, and destructive.

iii. 14. "For righteousness' sake:" "Not the punishment, but the cause makes a martyr" (Augustine). "Be not afraid:" literally, "Be not afraid with their fear"—i.e., the fear with which persecutors seek to inspire their victims.

iii. 15. "A reason of the hope that is in you:" "how this hope arose, what it contains, and on what it rests" (Stieger, in Fausset). "The hope of Christians often moves others to make inquiry" (Bengel).

iii. 18. Not "by the Spirit," as Authorised Version, but "in the Spirit." So Wickliffe, Tyndal, Cranmer, Geneva, Rheims, Vulgate.

iii. 19. "In which" (i.e., in the Spirit) "he went," &c.: many interpretations of this most difficult passage have been offered. Some think that it refers to Christ's spirit acting in Noah, who preached to the disbelieving before the Flood; but the plain words are "to the spirits in prison," not to the unbelievers on earth. Others say, Christ went and preached salvation to the disembodied spirits. But

18 For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit:

The example of Christ is here proposed as an argument for patience under sufferings, the strength of which will be discerned, if we consider the several points contained in the words. [Our Lord is termed the Christ, or Anointed One, as standing apart by himself, far elevated above all other anointed persons; just as he is, amid the countless millions of the sons of men, termed the Son of man.—B.] Observe, therefore,

First. Jesus Christ himself was not exempted from sufferings in this life, though he had no guilt of his own, and could have declined all suffering if he had pleased.

Secondly. The reason or meritorious cause of Christ's suffering was the sins of men; Christ "suffered for sins." The sufferings of Christ were a true and proper punishment. This punishment was suffered to expiate and to make an atonement for sin, and it does extend to all sins.

Thirdly. In the case of our Lord's suffering, it was the Just [the Just One, Pe. xxiv. 19, compare with 20; Isa. liii. 11; Zec. ix. 9] that suffered for the unjust. He substituted himself in our room and stead, and bore our iniquities. He that knew no sin suffered instead of them that knew no righteousness.

Fourthly. The merit and perfection of Christ's sacrifice was such, that for him to suffer once was enough. The legal sacrifices were repeated from day to day, and from year to year; but the sacrifice of Christ once offered purgeth away sin, Heb. vii. 27; ix. 26, 28; x. 10, 12, 14.

Fifthly. The blessed end and design of our Lord's sufferings was to "bring us to God," to reconcile us to God, to give us access to the Father, to render us and our services acceptable, and to bring us to eternal glory, Eph. ii. 13, 18; iii. 12; Heb. x. 21, 22.

Sixthly. The issue and event of Christ's suffering as to himself was this, he was put to death in his human nature, but he was quickened and raised again by the Spirit.

Now, if Christ was not exempted from sufferings, why should Christians expect it? If he suffered to expiate sins, why should not we be content when our sufferings are only for trial and correction, but not for expiation? If he, though perfectly just, why should not we, who are all criminals? If he once suffered, and then entered into glory, shall not we be patient under trouble, since it will be but a little time, and we shall follow him to glory? If he suffered to bring us to God, shall not we submit to difficulties, since they are of so much use to quicken us in our return to God, and in the performance of our duty to him?

19 By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison; 20 Which sometime were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.

Here the apostle passeth from the example of Christ to that of the old world, and sets before the Jews, to whom he wrote, the different event of them that believed and obeyed Christ preaching by Noah, from them that continued disobedient and unbelieving; intimating to the Jews that they were under a like sentence. God would not wait much longer upon them. They had now an offer of mercy; those that accepted of it should be saved, but those that rejected Christ and the Gospel should be as certainly destroyed as ever the disobedient in the times of Noah were. Observe here,

First. The preacher, Christ Jesus, who interested himself in the affairs of the church, and of the world, ever since he was first promised to Adam; Gen. iii. 15, "He went," not by a local motion, but by special operation, as God is frequently said to move, Gen. xi. 5; Hos. v. 15; Mic. i. 3. He went and preached by his Spirit striving with them, and inspiring and enabling Enoch and Noah to plead with them and preach righteousness to them, as 2 Pet. ii. 5.

Secondly. The hearers; who, because they were dead and disembodied when the apostle speaks of them, therefore he properly calls them spirits now in prison; not that they were in prison when Christ preached to them, as the vulgar Latin translation and the popish expositors pretend.

Thirdly. The sin of these people. They were "disobedient," that is, 'rebellious, unpersuadable, and unbelieving,' as the word signifies. Their sin is aggravated from the patience and longsuffering of God, which once waited upon them one hundred and twenty years together, while Noah was preparing the ark, and by that, as well as by his preaching, giving them fair warning of what was coming upon them.

Fourthly. The event of all. Their bodies were drowned, and their spirits cast into hell, which is called a prison, Mat. v. 25; 2 Pet. ii. 4, 5; but Noah and his family, that believed and were obedient, were saved in the ark.

[See XVI. of Dr. Brown's Expository Discourses, and Appendix to it, for a full discussion of this difficult text. The following is his version of it. For, even Christ, once, on account of sins, suffered,—the righteous in the room of the unrighteous,—that he might bring us to God; having become dead, with respect to the flesh, but quickened with respect to the spirit, whereby he went and preached even to the spirits in prison, who were in former times disobedient, when the patience of God continued waiting in the days of Noah, while the ark was preparing, in which few,—that is, eight,—souls were saved by water, which also now—the antitype baptism—saves us, not as the removal of the filth of the flesh, but as the profession of a good conscience towards God, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, who is at the right hand of God, having passed into heaven, angels, and authorities, and powers, having been subjected to him. He adds: 'This view of the subject has this additional advantage, that it preserves the connexion of the passage, both grammatical and logical. The words of the apostle, thus explained, plainly bear on his great practical object. Be not afraid, be not ashamed of suffering in a good cause, in a right spirit. No damage comes from well-doing, or from suffering in well-doing. Christ, in suffering, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, suffered for well-doing; and, though his sufferings ended in his dying bodily, they ended also in his being spiritually quickened; and, through the effectual manifestation of the truth, becoming the "Author of eternal salvation to all who obey him." Nor is this all. Even his mortal body has, in consequence of these sufferings, been raised from the grave; and in that body he is "gone into heaven, and has sat down on the right hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers, being made subject to him."' I am farther confirmed in this view of the passage by observing that in one very important part of it I have the support of Archbishop Leighton. In the text of his commentary he interprets the passage according to the usual Protestant mode of exposition; but in a note he observes—Thus I then thought, but do now apprehend another sense as more probable. The mission of the Spirit, and the preaching of the Gospel by it, after his resurrection: preaching to sinners, and converting them according to the prophecy which he first fulfilled in person, and after, more amply, in his apostles; that prophecy, I mean Isa. lxi., The Spirit was upon him, and was sent from him to his apostles, to preach to spirits in prison, to preach liberty to the captives, captive spirits, and therefore called spirits in prison, to illustrate the thing the more by opposition to that Spirit of Christ, the Spirit of liberty, setting them free; and this to shew the greater efficacy of Christ's preaching than of Noah's: though he was a signal preacher of righteousness, yet only himself and his family, eight persons, were saved by him, but multitudes of all nations by the Spirit and preaching of Christ in the Gospel.—B.]

Learn, 1. That God takes exact notice of all the means and advantages that people in all ages have had for the salvation of their souls. It is put to the account of the old world that Christ offered them his help, sent his Spirit, gave them fair warning by Noah, and waited a long time for their amendment. 2. Though the patience of God wait long upon sinners, yet it will expire at last. It is beneath the majesty of the great God always to wait upon man in vain. 3. The spirits of disobedient sinners, as soon as they are out of their bodies, are committed to the prison of hell, from whence there is no redemption. 4. The way of the most is neither the best, the wisest, nor the safest way to follow. Better to follow the eight in the ark, than the eight millions drowned by the flood, and damned to hell.

21 The like figure whereunto even baptism doth also now save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God,) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ:

Noah's salvation in the ark upon the water did prefigure the salvation of all good Christians in the church by baptism. That temporal salvation by the ark was a type, the antitype whereunto is the eternal salvation of believers by baptism.

[The words may be rendered with perfect accuracy, 'which was a type or figure of the baptism which saves us;' that is, which water of the deluge is a type, or significant resemblance (for that it was a type in the strict sense of the word, as a foreshowing dimly to the antediluvians Christian baptism, or its meaning, is a principle utterly without support) of baptism which saves us.—B.]

To prevent mistakes about which, the apostle does, First. Declare what he means by saving baptism; not the outward ceremony or washing with water, which in itself does no more than put away "the filth of the flesh," but it is that baptism wherein there is a faithful answer or restitution of a resolved good conscience, engaging to believe in, and be entirely devoted to, God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; renouncing at the same time the flesh, the world, and the devil. The baptismal covenant made and kept will certainly save us. Washing is the visible sign; this is the thing signified.

Secondly. The apostle shews that the efficacy of baptism to salvation depends not upon the work done, but upon the resurrection of Christ; which supposeth his death, and is the foundation of our faith and hope to which we are rendered conformable by dying to sin, and rising again to holiness and newness of life.

Learn, 1. That the sacrament of baptism rightly received is a means and a pledge of salvation. Baptism now saveth us. God is pleased to convey his blessings to us in and by his ordinances, Acts ii. 38; xxii. 16. 2. The external participation of baptism will save no man without an answerable good conscience and conversation. There must be the "answer of a good conscience" towards God. Objection. Infants cannot make such an answer, and therefore ought not to be baptized. Answer. The true circumcision was that of the heart and of the spirit, Rom. ii. 29, which children were no more capable of than our infants are capable of making this answer now; yet they were allowed circumcision at eight days old. The infants of the Christian church therefore may be admitted to the ordinance with as much reason as the infants of the Jewish, unless they are barred from it by some express prohibition of Christ.

22 Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God; angels and authorities and powers being made subject unto him.

The apostle having mentioned the death of Christ, ver. 18, and his resurrection, ver. 21, he proceeds to speak of his ascension, and sitting at the right hand of the Father, as a subject fit to be considered by these believers for their comfort in their suffering condition. If the advancement of Christ was so glorious after his deep humiliation, let not his followers despair, but expect that after these short distresses they shall be advanced to transcendent joy and glory.

Learn, 1. That Jesus Christ, after he had finished his labours and his sufferings upon earth, did ascend triumphantly into heaven, of which see Acts i. 9—11; Mar. xvi. 19. He went to heaven to receive his own acquired crown and glory, Jno. xvi. 5; to finish that part of his mediatorial work which could not be done on earth, and make intercession for his people; to demonstrate the fulness of his satisfaction, to take possession of heaven for his people, and prepare mansions for them, and to send down the Comforter, which was to be the first-fruits of his intercession, Jno. xvi. 7. 2. Upon his ascension into heaven Christ is enthroned at the right hand of the Father. His being said to sit there imports absolute rest and cessation from all farther troubles and sufferings, and an advancement to the highest personal dignity and sovereign power. 3. That "angels, authorities, and powers," are all made subject to Christ Jesus; "all power in heaven and earth," to command, to give law, issue orders, and pronounce a final sentence, is committed to Jesus, God-man, which his enemies will find to their everlasting sorrow and confusion, but his servants to their eternal joy and satisfaction.

CHAPTER IV.

The work of a Christian is twofold: doing the will of God, and suffering his pleasure. This chapter directs us in both. The duties we are here exhorted to employ ourselves in are the mortification of sin, living to God, sobriety, prayer, charity, hospitality, and the best improvement of our talents, which the apostle preseth upon Christians from the consideration of the time they have lost in their sins, and the approaching end of all things, ver. 1—12. The directions for sufferings are, that we should not be surprised at them, but rejoice in them, only take care not to suffer as evil-doers. He intimates that their trials were near at hand, that their souls were in danger as well as their bodies; and the best way to preserve their souls is to commit them to God in well doing, ver. 13—19.

to what end? Holy Scripture represents the final state of souls as fixed when they leave the body, though not fully coming upon them till the resurrection. The most simple explanation seems to be that the spirit of our Lord went to the place of departed spirits, waiting for the resurrection (see Article III. of Church of England, exposition by Bishop Browne), and there announced to those who had trusted in the promised Messiah that he had accomplished Messiah's work, and their trust was justified. The only difficulty in this interpretation is the special mention of the disobedient in the days of Noah; but Bishop Horsley thinks he has observed in some parts of Scripture an anxiety, if the expression may be allowed, of the sacred writers to convey distinct intimations that the antediluvian race is not uninterested in the redemption and final retribution. It may be conceived, too, he thinks, that those who perished in the most awful of God's temporal judgments would, more than any, need and look for the comfort of Christ's presence; for, as he and many others have

ORASMUCH then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin;

The apostle here draws a new inference from the consideration of Christ's sufferings. As he had before made use of it to persuade to patience in suffering, so here to mortification of sin. The antecedent or supposition is, that "Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh," or in his human nature. The consequent or inference is, "arm" and fortify "yourselves likewise with the same mind," courage, and resolution. The word flesh in the former part of the verse signifies Christ's human nature, but in the latter part it signifies man's corrupt nature. So the sense is, As Christ suffered in his human nature, do you, according to your baptismal vow and profession, make your corrupt nature suffer, by putting to death the body of sin, by self-denial and mortification; for if you do thus suffer in the flesh, or make the flesh suffer, you will be conformable to Christ in his death and resurrection, and will cease from sin.

[See additional notes on Rom. vi for true import of this latter clause. Barnes says, "To 'suffer in the flesh' is to die. The expression here has a proverbial aspect, and seems to have meant something like this: 'When a man is dead, he will sin no more,' referring of course to the present life. So, if a Christian becomes dead in a moral sense—dead to this world, dead by being crucified with Christ—he may be expected to cease from sin. The reasoning is based on the idea that there is such a union between Christ and the believer that his death on the cross secured the death of the believer to the world: compare 2 Tim. ii. 11; Col. ii. 20; iii. 3."—Barnes. So also Leighton: Christ and the believer do not only become one in law, so as his death stands for theirs, but are one in nature, so as his death for sin causes theirs to it; Rom. vi. 3, "Baptized into his death."—L.]

Learn, 1. Some of the strongest and best arguments against all sorts of sin are taken from the sufferings of Christ. All sympathy and tenderness for Christ as a sufferer is lost if you do not put away sin. He died to destroy it; and though he could cheerfully submit to the worst sufferings, yet he could never submit to the least sin. 2. The beginning of all true mortification lies in the mind, not in penances and hardships upon the body. The mind of man is carnal, full of enmity; the understanding is darkened, being alienated from the life of God, Eph. iv. 18. Man is not a sincere creature, but partial, blind, and wicked, till he be renewed and sanctified by the regenerating grace of God—grace received through union to Christ, and so enabling us to suffer in the flesh with him, and to cease from sin.

2 That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

Here the apostle explains what he means by being dead to sin, and ceasing from sin. Negatively a Christian ought no longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh to the sinful lusts and corrupt desires of carnal, wicked men; but positively he ought to conform himself to the revealed will of the holy God.

Learn, 1. The lusts of men are the springs of all their wickedness, Jas. i. 13, 14. Let occasional temptations be what they will, they could not prevail, were it not for men's own corruptions. 2. All good Christians make the will of God, not their own lusts or desires, the rule of their lives and actions. 3. True conversion makes a marvellous change in the heart and life of every one that partakes of it. It brings a man off from all his old, fashionable, and delightful lusts, and from the common ways and vices of the world to the will of God. It alters the mind, judgment, affections, way, and conversation of every one that hath experienced it.

3 For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries:

Here the apostle argues from equity. It is but just, equal, and reasonable, that, as you have hitherto all the former part of your life served sin and Satan, so you should now serve the living God. Though these were Jews to whom the apostle writes, yet, living among the Gentiles, they had learned their way.

Learn, 1. When a man is truly converted, it is very grievous to him to think how the time past of his life has been spent; the hazard he hath run so many years, the mischief he hath done to others, the dishonour done to God, and the loss he hath sustained, are very afflicting to him. 2. Whilst the will of man is unsanctified and corrupt, he walks continually in wicked ways, he makes them his choice and delight, his work and business, and he makes a bad condition daily worse and worse. 3. One sin allowed draws on another. Here are six named, and they have a connexion and dependence one upon another. 1st. "Lasciviousness," or wantonness, expressed in looks, gesture, or behaviour, Rom. xiii. 13. 2nd. "Lusts;" acts of lewdness, such as fornication and adultery. 3rd. "Excess of wine;" though short of drunkenness, an immoderate use of it, to the prejudice of health or business, is here condemned. 4th. "Revellings;" or luxurious feastings, too frequent, too full, or too expensive. 5th. "Banquetings;" by which is meant gluttony, or excess in eating. 6th. "Abominable idolatries;" the idol worship of the Gentiles was attended with lewdness, drunkenness, gluttony, and all sorts of brutality and cruelty; and these Jews, living long amongst them, were, some of them at least, debauched and corrupted by such practices. 4. It is a Christian's duty not only to abstain from what is grossly wicked, but also from those things that are generally the occasions of sin, or carry the appearance of evil. Excess of wine and immoderate feasting are forbidden as well as lust and idolatry.

4 Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you:

Here you have the visible change wrought in those who, in the foregoing verse, were represented as having been, in the former part of their life, very wicked. They no longer run on in the same courses, or with the same companions, as they used to do. Hereupon observe the carriage of their wicked acquaintance towards them.

First, "They think it strange;" they are surprised, and wonder at it, as at something new and unusual, that their old friends should be so much altered, and not run with as much violence as they used to do, to "the same excess of riot," to the same sottish excesses and luxury which before they had greedily and madly followed.

Secondly, They speak evil of them. Their surprise carries them to blasphemy. They speak evil of their persons, of their way, their religion, and their God.

Learn, 1. They that are once really converted will not return to their former course of life, though never so much tempted by the frowns or flatteries of others to do so. Neither persuasion nor reproach will prevail with them to be or to do as they were wont to do. 2. The temper and behaviour of true Christians seems very strange to ungodly men. That they should despise that which every one else is fond of; that they should believe many things which to others seem incredible; that they should delight in what is irksome and tedious, and be zealous where they have no visible interest to serve, and that they should depend so much upon hope. 3. The best actions of religious people cannot escape the censures and slanders of them that are irreligious. Those actions which cost a good man the most pains, hazard, and self-denial, shall be most censured by the uncharitable and ill-natured world; they will speak evil of good people, though they themselves reap the fruits of their charity, piety, and goodness.

5 Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

For the comfort of the servants of God, it is here added, that all wicked people, especially those that speak evil of them that are not as bad as themselves, shall give an account, and be put to give a reason of their behaviour, "to him that is ready to judge;" that is, both able, and duly authorised, and that will, ere long, judge and pass sentence upon all that shall then be found alive, and all such as, being dead, shall then be raised again, Jas. v. 8, 9; 2 Pet. iii. 7.

Learn, That the malignant world shall, in a little time, give an account to the great God of all their evil speeches against his people, Jude 14, 15. They will soon be called to a sad account for all their curses, their foolish jests, their slanders and falsehoods, uttered against the faithful people of God.

6 For for this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

Some understand this difficult place thus: "For this cause was the Gospel preached" to all the faithful of old, that are now dead in Christ, that thereby they might be taught and encouraged to bear the unrighteous judgments and persecutions which the rage of men did put upon them in the flesh, but might live in the spirit unto God. Others take the expression, "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh." In a spiritual sense thus: The Gospel was preached to them, to judge them, condemn them, and reprove them for the corruption of their natures and the viciousness of their lives, which they lived after the manner of the heathen, or the mere natural man; and that, having thus mortified their sins, they might "live according to God," a new and spiritual life. Take it thus; and thence,

Learn, 1. That the mortifying our sins, and living to God, are the expected effects of the Gospel preached unto us. 2. That God will certainly reckon with all those that have had the Gospel preached unto them, but without these good effects produced by it. God is ready to judge all those that have received his Gospel in vain. 3. It is no matter how we are "judged according to men in the flesh," if we do "but live according to God in the spirit." [The argument in this verse is, that in the trials which we endure on account of religion, we should remember the example of those who have suffered for it, and should remember why the Gospel was preached to them. It was in a subordinate sense, indeed, that they might glorify God by a martyr's death; but in a higher sense, that in this world and the next they might truly live. The flesh might suffer in consequence of their embracing the Gospel that was preached to them, but the soul would live. Animated by their example, we should be willing to suffer in the flesh, if we may for ever live with God.—Barnes.]

We have here an awful position or doctrine, and an inference drawn from it. The position is, that "the end of all things is at hand." The miserable destruction of the Jewish church and nation, foretold by our Saviour, is now very near; consequently the time of their persecution and your suffering is but very short. Your own life, and that of your enemies, will soon come to their utmost period. Nay, the world itself will not continue very long. The conflagration will put an end to it, and all things must be swallowed up in an endless eternity. The inference from this is, "Be ye therefore sober." Let the frame and temper of your minds be grave, staid, and solid; and observe strict temperance and sobriety in the use of all worldly enjoyments. Do not suffer yourselves to be caught with your former sins and temptations; ver. 3, "And watch unto prayer." Take care that you be continually in a calm, sober disposition, fit for prayer; and that you be frequent in prayers, lest this end come upon you unawares, Lu. xxi. 34; Mat. xxvi. 40, 41.

Learn, 1. The consideration of our approaching end is a powerful argument to make us sober in all worldly matters, and earnest in religious affairs. 2. They that would pray to purpose must "watch unto prayer." They must watch over their own spirits, and watch all fit opportunities, and do their duty in the best manner they can. 3. The right ordering of the body is of great use to promote the good of the soul. When the appetites and inclinations of the body are restrained and governed by God's word and true reason, [and above all by Divine grace received in answer to believing prayer,] and the interests of the body are submitted to the interests and necessities of the soul—then it is not the soul's enemy, but its friend and helper.

held, it follows not that all who perished in the Flood must perish everlastingly, since (Bengel and Luther) many may have repented at the last moment.

iii. 21. "Which—the antitype, even baptism—doth now save you (so best MSS.), not," &c.: "Water saved Noah not of itself, but by sustaining the ark, built in faith, resting on God's word. . . . The antitypical water—viz., baptism—saves you also, not of itself, not the mere material water, but the spiritual thing conjoined with it, repentance and faith" (Fausset). "Seeking after God in a good and pure conscience, which is the aim and end of the Christian baptismal life" (Alford). "By the resurrection of Jesus Christ:" "not" to "God" is a parenthesis; so this clause must follow "doth now save us." "His resurrection and entrance into his kingdom giving us by him . . . an entrance also into his kingdom, by means of his appointed sacrament of holy baptism, spiritually received" (Alford).

iv. 1. "He that hath suffered," &c.: a general proposition. Since

8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins.

Here is a noble rule in Christianity. The grace recommended is, "Charity among yourselves." Christians ought to love one another; which implies an affection to their persons, a desire of their welfare, and a hearty endeavour to promote it. The degree of this mutual affection is, it must not be cold, but fervent; that is, sincere, strong, and lasting. This sort of earnest affection is recommended "above all things," which shews the importance of it, Col. iii. 14. It is greater than faith or hope, 1 Cor. xiii. 13. One excellent effect of it is, that it will "cover the multitude of sins."

Learn, 1. There ought to be in all Christians a more fervent charity towards one another than towards other men. Have "charity among yourselves." He does not say for pagans, for idolaters, or for apostates, but "among yourselves." [Of course this does not exclude love for pagans, for idolaters, or even apostates: Lu. x. 25-37; Gal. vi. 10; Note on Jas. i. 27; 1 Pet. iii. 17, first clause.] "Let brotherly love continue," Heb. xiii. 1. There is a special relation between all sincere Christians, and a particular amiableness and good in them, which requires special affection. 2. It is not enough for Christians not to bear malice, or to have common respects for one another, they must intensely and fervently love each other. 3. It is the property of true charity to "cover a multitude of sins." It inclines people to forgive and forget offences against themselves; to cover and conceal the sins of others, rather than aggravate them, and spread them abroad. It teaches us to love them that are but weak, and that have been guilty of many ill things before their conversion; and it prepares for mercy at the hand of God, who hath promised to forgive them that forgive others, Mat. vi. 14.

The hospitality here required is a free and kind entertainment of strangers and travellers. The proper objects of a Christian's hospitality are one another. The nearness of their relation, and the necessity of their condition in those times of persecution and distress, did oblige Christians to be hospitable one to another. Sometimes Christians were despoiled of all they had, and were driven away to distant countries for safety. In this case they must starve, if their fellow-Christians would not receive them. Therefore it was a wise and necessary rule which the apostle here laid down. It is elsewhere commanded, Rom. xii. 13; Heb. xiii. 1, 2. The manner of performing this duty is this: it must be done in an easy, kind, handsome manner; "without grudging," or grumbling at the expense or trouble.

Learn, 1. That Christians ought not only to be charitable but hospitable one to another. 2. Whatever a Christian does by way of charity, or of hospitality, he ought to do it cheerfully, and without grudging. Freely you have received, freely give.

10 As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

Here the apostle gives directions about the improvement of talents. The rule is, that whatever gift, ordinary or extraordinary, whatever power, ability, or capacity of doing good, is given to us, we should minister or do service with "the same one to another;" accounting ourselves not masters, but only "stewards of the manifold grace," or the various gifts of God.

Learn, 1. Whatever ability we have of doing good, we must own it to be the gift of God, and ascribe it to his grace. 2. Whatever gifts we have received, we ought to look upon them as received for the use one of another. We must not assume them to ourselves, or hide them in a napkin, but do service with them one to another in the best manner we are able. 3. In receiving and using the manifold gifts of God we must look upon ourselves as stewards only, and act accordingly. The talents we are intrusted with are our Lord's goods, and must be employed as he directs. And it is required in a steward that he be found faithful.

11 If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

The apostle exemplifies his direction about gifts in two particulars: speaking and ministering; concerning which he gives these rules: First, If any man, whether a minister in public or a Christian in private conference, do speak or teach, he must do it "as the oracle of God;" which directs us as to the matter of our speech. What Christians in private, or ministers in public, teach and speak, must be the pure word and oracles of God. As to the manner of speaking, it must be with that seriousness, reverence, and solemnity that becomes those holy and Divine oracles. Secondly, "If any man minister," either as a deacon distributing the alms of the church, and taking care of the poor, or as a private person, by charitable gifts and contributions, "let him do it as of the ability which God giveth." He that hath received plenty and ability from God ought to minister plentifully, and according to his ability. These rules ought to be followed and practised for this end, "that God in all things," in all your gifts, ministrations, and services, "may be glorified;" that others "may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven," Mat. v. 16; "through Jesus Christ," who hath procured and given these gifts to men, Eph. iv. 8; and through whom alone we and our services are accepted of God, Heb. xiii. 15; to which Jesus Christ "be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen."

Learn, 1. It is the duty of Christians in private, as well as ministers in public, to speak to one another of the things of God, Mal. iii. 16; Eph. iv. 29; Ps. cxlv. 10-12. 2. It highly concerns all preachers of the Gospel to keep close to the word of God, and to treat that word as becomes the oracles of God. 3. Christians must not only do the duties of their place, but they must do it with vigour, and according to the best of their abilities. The nature of a Christian's work, which is high work, and hard work, the goodness and kindness of the Master, and the excellency of the reward, do all require that our endeavours should be serious and vigorous; and that whatever we are called to do for the honour of God, and the good of others, we should do it with all our might. 4. In all the duties and services of life we should aim at the glory of God as our chief end; all other views must be subservient to that, which would sanctify our common actions and affairs, 1 Cor. x. 31. 5. God is not glorified by any thing we do, if we do not offer it to him through the mediation and merits of Jesus Christ. "God in all things must be glorified through Jesus Christ," who is the only way to the Father. 6. The apostle's adoration of Jesus Christ, and ascribing unlimited and everlasting praise and dominion to him, proves that Jesus Christ is the most high God over all, blessed for evermore. Amen.

12 Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: 13 But rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

The frequent repetition of counsel and comfort to Christians, considered as sufferers, in every chapter of this epistle, sheweth that the greatest danger these new converts were in arose from the persecutions to which their embracing Christianity did expose them. The creditable behaviour of Christians under sufferings is the most difficult part of their duty, but yet necessary both for the honour of Christ and their own comfort; and therefore the apostle, having exhorted them in the former part of this chapter to the great duty of mortification, does here come to direct them in the necessary duty of patience under suffering. An unmortified spirit is very unfit to bear trials. Observe,

First, The apostle's kind manner of address to these poor, despised Christians. They were his "beloved."

Secondly, His advice to them, relating to their sufferings; which is, that they should not think them strange, nor be surprised at them, as if some unexpected event befel them; for, though they be sharp and fiery, yet they are designed only to try, not to ruin them; to try their sincerity, strength, patience, and trust in God. On the contrary, they ought rather to rejoice under their sufferings, because theirs may properly be called Christ's sufferings. They are of the same kind and for the same cause that Christ suffered; they make us conformable to him; he suffers in them, and feels our infirmities; and if we be partakers of his sufferings, we shall also be made partakers of his glory, and shall meet him with exceeding joy at his great appearing to judge his enemies, and crown his faithful servants, 2 Thes. i. 7.

Learn, 1. True Christians do love and own the children of God in their lowest and most distressing circumstances. The apostle owns these poor, afflicted Christians, and calls them his beloved. True Christians never look more amiable one to another than in their adversities. 2. There is no reason for Christians to think it strange, or to wonder at the unkindnesses and persecutions of the world, because they are forewarned of them. Christ himself endured them; and the forsaking all, denying ourselves, and bearing the cross, are the terms upon which Christ accepts of us to be his disciples. 3. Christians ought not only to be patient, but to rejoice in their sharpest and sorest sufferings for Christ, because they are tokens of Divine favour; they promote the Gospel, and prepare for glory. They that rejoice in their sufferings for Christ shall eternally triumph and rejoice with him in glory.

14 If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you: on their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified.

From the fiery trial the apostle descends to a lower degree of persecution,—that of the tongue by slander and reproach. He supposeth this sort of suffering would fall to their lot; they would be reviled, evil-spoken of, and slandered, for the name or sake of Christ. In such case he asserts, "Happy are ye." The reason of which is, because ye have the Spirit of God with you to fortify and comfort you; and the Spirit of God is also the Spirit of glory that will carry you through all, and bring you off gloriously, and will prepare and seal you up for eternal glory. This glorious Spirit "resteth upon you," resideth with you, dwelleth in you, supporteth you, and is pleased with you; and is not this a mighty happiness? By your patience and fortitude in suffering, by your dependence upon the promises of God, and adhering to the word which the Holy Spirit hath revealed, he is "on your part glorified;" but by the contempt and reproaches cast upon you the Spirit itself is evil-spoken of and blasphemed.

Learn, 1. The best men, and the best things, do usually meet with reproaches in the world. Jesus Christ and his followers, the Spirit of God and the Gospel, all are evil-spoken of. 2. The happiness of good people does not only consist with, but even flow from, their afflictions. "Happy are ye." 3. That man that hath the Spirit of God resting upon him cannot be miserable, let his afflictions be never so great. "Happy are ye; for the Spirit of God" &c. 4. The blasphemies and reproaches which evil men cast upon good people [believers] are taken by the Spirit of God as cast upon himself; "On their part he is evil-spoken of." 5. When good people are vilified "for the name of Christ," his Holy Spirit is glorified in them.

15 But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evildoer, or as a busybody in other men's matters. 16 Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

One would think such a caution as this needless to such an excellent set of Christians as these were; but their enemies did charge them with these and other foul crimes; therefore the apostle, when he was settling the rules of the Christian religion, thought these cautions necessary, forbidding to every one of them to hurt the life, or the estate and property, of any one, or to do any sort of evil; or, without call and necessity, to play the bishop in another man's charge, or busy one's self "in other men's matters." To this caution he adds a direction, that "if any man suffer" for the cause of Christianity, and with a patient, Christian spirit, he ought not to account it a shame, but an honour to him; and ought to glorify God who hath thus dignified him.

Learn, 1. The best of men need to be warned against the worst of sins. 2. There is very little comfort in sufferings when we bring them upon ourselves by our own sin and folly. It is not the suffering but the cause makes the martyr.

the flesh is the seat of sin, he who has subdued the flesh has rid himself of sin.

iv. 3. "For the time past may suffice to have wrought," &c.: so best MSS.

iv. 6. "Them that are dead:" i.e., past generations. "According to men," &c.: those who are dead had the Gospel preached to them, which, though it did not save them from paying the penalty of sin in the flesh—death—yet gave them a higher life, a spiritual one, with God. Both St. Peter and St. Paul are careful to impress upon us the equality of the dead, the living, and those who shall be alive at Christ's coming, with respect to future glory (1 Thess. iv. 15).

iv. 8. "Covereth a multitude:" so most old MSS. In the first place meaning mutual love hiding rather than exposing faults; possibly, also, endeavouring to cover them from God's sight, by praying for their pardon. (See Note on James v. 20.)

iv. 11. "As oracles of God," not "the oracles:" he is to speak

3. We have reason to thank God for the honour, if he calls us out to suffer for his truth and Gospel, for any of the doctrines or duties of Christianity.

17 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

The usual method of Providence hath been this:—When God brings great calamities and sore judgments upon whole nations, he generally begins with his own people, Isa. x. 12; Jer. xxv. 29; Eze. ix. 6. Such a time of universal calamity is now at hand, which was foretold by our Saviour, Mat. xxiv. 9, 10. This renders all the foregoing exhortations to patience necessary for you. And you have two considerations to support you: First. That these judgments will but begin with you that are God's house and family, and will soon be over. Your trials and corrections will not last long. Secondly. Your troubles will be but light and short in comparison of what shall befall the wicked world,—your own countrymen the Jews, and the infidels and idolatrous people among whom you live. "What shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel of God?"

Learn, 1. The best of God's servants, his own household, have so much amiss in them as renders it fit and necessary that God should sometimes correct and punish them with his judgments. "Judgment begins at the house of God." 2. They that are the family of God have their worst things in this life. Their worst condition is tolerable, and will soon be over. 3. Such persons or societies of men as disobey the Gospel of God are not of his church and household, though possibly they may make the loudest pretensions to it. The apostle distinguisheth the disobedient from the house of God. 4. The sufferings of good people in this life are demonstrations of the unspeakable torments that are coming upon the disobedient and unbelieving. "What shall the end be of those that obey not the Gospel?" Who can express or say how dreadful their end will be?

18 And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

This whole verse is taken from Pr. xi. 31, "Behold the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; how much more the wicked and the sinner?" This the Seventy translate exactly as the apostle here quotes it. Whence we may Learn, 1. That the grievous sufferings of good people in this world are sad presages of much heavier judgments coming upon impenitent sinners. But if we take the salvation here in the highest sense, then we may learn, 2. That it is as much as the best can do to secure the salvation of their souls; there are so many sufferings, temptations, and difficulties to be overcome; so many sins to be mortified; the gate is so strait, and the way so narrow, that it is as much as the righteous can do to be saved. Let the absolute necessity of salvation balance the difficulty of it. Consider, your difficulties are greatest at first: God offers his grace and help; the contest will not last long. Be but faithful to the death, and God will give you the crown of life, Rev. ii. 10. 3. The ungodly and the sinner are unquestionably in a state of damnation. Where shall they appear? How will they stand before their Judge? Where can they shew their heads? "If the righteous scarcely be saved," the wicked must certainly perish.

19 Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

Here the apostle finisheth his discourse concerning sufferings, and gives this general advice, "Let them that suffer according to the will of God" look chiefly to the safety of their souls, which are put into hazard by afflictions, and cannot be kept secure otherwise than by committing them to God, who will undertake the charge, if we commit them to him in well-doing; for he is their Creator, and hath, out of mere grace, made many kind promises to them of eternal salvation, in which he will shew himself faithful and true.

Learn, 1. That all the sufferings that befall good people come upon them "according to the will of God." 2. It is the duty of Christians, in all their distresses, to look more to the keeping of their souls than to the preserving of their bodies. The soul is of greatest value, and yet in most danger. If suffering from without raise uneasiness, vexation, and other sinful and tormenting passions within, the soul is then the greatest sufferer. If the soul be not well kept, persecution will drive people to apostasy, Ps. cxv. 3. 3. The only way to keep the soul well is to commit it to God in well-doing. Commit your souls to God by solemn dedication, prayer, and patient perseverance in well-doing, Rom. ii. 7. 4. Good people, when they are in affliction, have great encouragement to commit their souls to God, because he is their Creator, and faithful in all his promises.

CHAPTER V.

In which the apostle gives particular directions, first to the elders, how to behave themselves towards their flock, in the first four verses; then to the younger, to be obedient and humble, and to cast their care upon God, in the next three verses. From thence to the end he exhorts all to sobriety, watchfulness against temptations, and steadfastness in the faith, praying earnestly for them; and so concludes his epistle with a solemn doxology, mutual salutations, and his apostolical benediction.

HE elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed:

Here we may observe, First. The persons to whom this exhortation is given. To the presbyters, pastors, and spiritual guides of the church; elders by office rather than by age, ministers of those churches to whom he wrote this epistle.

Secondly. The person who gives this exhortation, the apostle Peter: "I exhort." And, to give force to his exhortation, he tells them he was their brother presbyter or fellow-elder, and so puts nothing upon them but what he was ready to perform himself. He was also "a witness of the sufferings of Christ," being with him in the garden, attending him to the palace of the high priest, and very likely was a spectator of his suffering upon the cross, at a distance among the crowd, Acts iii. 15. He adds that he was also a "partaker of the glory" that was in some degree revealed at the transfiguration, Mat. xvii. 1—3, and shall be completely enjoyed at the second coming of Jesus Christ.

Learn, 1. They whose office it is to teach others ought carefully to study their own duty, as well as to teach the people theirs. 2. How different the spirit and behaviour of Peter was from that of his pretended successors! He does not command and domineer, but exhort. He does not claim sovereignty over all pastors and churches, nor style himself prince of the apostles, vicar of Christ, or head of the church, but values himself upon being "an elder." All the apostles were elders, though every elder was not an apostle. 3. It was the peculiar honour of Peter, and a few more, to be the witnesses of Christ's sufferings, but it is the privilege of all true Christians to be partakers of the glory that shall be revealed.

2 Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; 3 Neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock.

Here you have the pastor's duty described, and the manner how that duty ought to be performed. The pastoral duty is threefold:—

First. To "feed the flock," by preaching to them the sincere word of God, and ruling them according to such directions and discipline as the word of God prescribes, both which are implied in this expression, "Feed the flock."

Secondly. The pastors of the church must "take the oversight thereof." The elders are exhorted to do the office of bishops, as the word signifies, by personal care and vigilance over all the flock committed to their charge.

Thirdly. They must be "examples to the flock," and practise that holiness, self-denial, mortification, and all other Christian duties which they preach and recommend to their people.

These duties must be performed, not by constraint, not because you must do them, not from compulsion of the civil power, or constraint of fear or shame, but from a willing mind, that takes pleasure in the work. Not for "filthy lucre," or any emoluments and profits attending the place where you reside, or any perquisite belonging to the office, "but of a ready mind;" regarding the flock more than the fleece, sincerely and cheerfully endeavouring to serve the church of God. Neither as being "lords over God's heritage," tyrannising over them by compulsion and coercive force, or imposing unscriptural and human inventions upon them, instead of necessary duty, Mat. xx. 25, 26; 2 Cor. i. 24.

Learn, 1. The eminent dignity of the church of God, and all the true members of it. These poor, dispersed, suffering Christians were the flock of God. The rest of the world is a brutal herd. These are an orderly flock, redeemed to God by the great Shepherd, living in holy love and communion one with another, "according to the will of God." They are also dignified with the title of God's heritage or clergy; his peculiar lot, chosen out of the common multitude for his own people, to enjoy his special favour and to do him special service. The word is never restrained in the New Testament to the ministers of religion only. 2. The pastors of the church ought to consider their people as the flock of God, as God's heritage, and treat them accordingly. They are not theirs to be lorded over at pleasure, but they are God's people, and should be treated with love, meekness, and tenderness, for the sake of him to whom they belong. 3. Those ministers that are either driven to the work by necessity, or drawn to it by "filthy lucre," can never perform their duty as they ought, because they do not do it willingly, and with a "ready mind." 4. The best way a minister can take to engage the respect of a people is to discharge his own duty among them in the best manner that he can, and to be a constant example to them of all that is good.

4 And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

In opposition to that "filthy lucre" which many proposed to themselves, as their principal motive in their undertaking and discharge of the pastoral office, the apostle sets before them the "crown of glory," designed by the great Shepherd, Jesus Christ, for all his faithful ministers.

Learn, 1. That Jesus Christ is "the chief Shepherd" of the whole flock and heritage of God. He bought them and ruleth them; he defendeth and saveth them for ever. He is also the chief Shepherd over all inferior shepherds; they derive their authority from him, act in his name, and are accountable to him at last. 2. This "chief Shepherd" will appear to judge all ministers and under-shepherds, to call them to account, whether they have faithfully discharged their work, both publicly and privately, according to the foregoing directions. 3. They that are found to have done their duty shall have what is infinitely better than temporal gain; they shall receive from the grand Shepherd a high degree of everlasting glory, "a crown of glory that fadeth not away."

5 Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder. Yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

Having settled and explained the duty of the pastors, or spiritual guides of the church, he comes now to instruct the flock how to behave themselves to their ministers, and to one another. He calls them the younger, as being generally younger than their grave pastors, and to put them in mind of their inferiority; the term younger being used by our Saviour to signify an inferior, Luk. xxii. 26. He exhorteth these that are younger and inferior to submit themselves to the elder, to give due respect and reverence to their persons, and to yield to their admonitions, reproof, and authority, enjoining and commanding what the word of God requires, Heb. xiii. 17. As to one another, the rule is, that they should all "be subject one to another," so far as to receive the reproofs and counsels one of another, and be ready to bear one another's burdens, and perform all the offices of friendship and charity one to another; and particular persons should submit to the directions of the whole society, Eph. v. 21; Jas. v. 16. These duties of submission to superiors in age or office, and subjection to one another, being contrary to the proud nature and selfish interests what he speaks as God's sayings, not his own. He is God's steward. "Which God giveth," the word signifies the supplying a chorus, with everything needful for their parts. "Amen;" not a note of conclusion, but of strong emotion of heart (Alford).

iv. 14. All oldest MSS. omit "on their part" to end of verse. iv. 17—19. Christians may rejoice in present suffering, since God chastens his people to wean them from the world, and punishes their sin now; but in the great day of his wrath they will be free.

v. 1. "Partaker of," according to Christ's promise (John xiii. 36).

v. 2. Sinaitic and Vatican omit "taking the oversight."

v. 3. Vatican MS. omits this verse, "Lords over God's heritage;" "God" is not expressed in the Greek; literally, "the heritages" or "portions" entrusted to you. "Not as though ye were lords over the parishes" (Tyndal).

v. 10. "Who called you, shall himself perfect you," &c.: so best MSS.

of men, he advises them to "he clothed with humility." Let your minds, behaviour, garb, and whole frame, be adorned with humility, as the most beautiful habit you can wear. This will render obedience and duty easy and pleasant; but if you be disobedient and proud, God will set himself to oppose and crush you; for he "resisteth the proud," when he "giveth grace to the humble."

Learn, 1. Humility is the great preserver of peace and order in all Christian churches and societies; consequently, pride is the great disturber of them, and the cause of most dissensions and breaches in the church. 2. There is a mutual opposition between God and the proud, so the word signifies. They war against him, and he scorneth them. He "resisteth the proud," because they are like the devil—enemies to himself and to his kingdom among men, Pr. iii. 34. 3. Where God giveth grace to be humble he will give more grace, more wisdom, faith, holiness, and humility.

6 Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time:

Since "God resisteth the proud," but "giveth grace to the humble," therefore humble yourselves not only one to another, but to the great God, whose judgments are coming upon the world, and must begin at the house of God, ch. iv. 17. His hand is almighty, and can easily pull you down if you be proud, or exalt you if you be humble; and will certainly do it, either in this life, if he see it best for you, or at the day of general retribution.

Learn, 1. The consideration of the omnipotent hand of God should make us humble and submissive to him in all that he brings upon us. 2. Humbling ourselves to God under his hand is the next way to deliverance and exaltation. Patience under his chastisements, submission to his pleasure, repentance, prayer, and hope in his mercy, will engage his help and release in due time, Jas. iv. 7, 10.

7 Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you.

The apostle, knowing that these Christians were already under very hard circumstances, does rightly suppose that what he had foretold of greater hardships yet a coming might excite in them abundance of care and fear about the event of these difficulties, what the issue of them would be to themselves, their families, and the church of God. Foreseeing this anxious care would be a heavy burthen, and a sore temptation, he gives them the best advice, and supports it with a strong argument; his advice is, to cast all their care, or all care of themselves, upon God. Throw your cares, which are so cutting and distracting,—that wound your souls and pierce your hearts,—upon the wise and gracious providence of God; trust in him with a firm composed mind, "for he careth for you." He is willing to release you of your fear, or support you under it. He will order all events to you, so as shall convince you of his paternal love and tenderness towards you; and all shall be so ordered that no hurt, but good, shall come unto you, Mat. vi. 25; Ps. lxxiv. 11; Rom. viii. 28.

Learn, 1. The best of Christians are apt to leopour under the burthen of anxious and excessive care. The apostle calls it "all your care," intimating that the cares of Christians are various, and of more sorts than one,—personal cares, family cares, cares for the present, and cares for the future, for themselves, for others, for the church. 2. The cares even of good people are very burthensome, and too often very sinful. When they arise from unbelief and diffidence, when they torture and distract the mind, unfit us for the duties of our place, and hinder our delightful service of God, they are very criminal. 3. The best remedy against immoderate care is, to cast our care upon God, and resign every event to his wise and gracious determination. A firm belief of the rectitude of the Divine will and counsels calms the spirit of man. "We ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done," Acts xxi. 14.

8 Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour: 9 Whom resist stedfast in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world.

Here the apostle does three things:

First. He shews them their danger from an enemy more cruel and restless than even the worst of men, whom he describes, 1. By his characters and names. He is an "adversary," that adversary of yours; not a common adversary, but an enemy that impleads you, and litigates against you in your grand depending cause, and aims at your very souls. 2. "The devil," the grand accuser of all the brethren. This title is derived from a word which signifies, 'to strike through,' or to stab. He would strike malignity into our natures, and poison into our souls. If he could have struck these people with passion and murmuring in their sufferings, perhaps he might have drawn them to apostasy and ruin. 3. He is "a roaring lion," hungry, fierce, strong, and cruel,—the fierce and greedy pursuer of souls. 2. By his business. He "walketh about, seeking whom he may devour." His whole design is to devour and destroy souls; to that end he is unwearied and restless in his malicious endeavours; for he always, night and day, goes about studying and contriving whom he may ensnare to their eternal ruin.

Secondly. Our duty inferred from hence is, 1. To "be sober," and to govern both the outward and the inward man by the rules of temperance, modesty, and mortification. 2. To "be vigilant." Not secure, or careless, but rather suspicious of constant danger from this spiritual enemy; and, under that apprehension, to be watchful and diligent to prevent his designs, and save our souls. 3. To resist him "stedfast in the faith." It was the faith of these people that Satan aimed at. If he could overturn their faith, and draw them into apostasy, then he knew he should gain his point, and ruin their souls. Therefore, to destroy their faith, he raises bitter persecutions, and sets the grand potentates of the world against them. This strong trial and temptation they must resist, by being well grounded, resolute and "stedfast in the faith." To encourage them to this,

Thirdly. The apostle tells them that their care was not singular, for they knew that the like afflictions befell their brethren in all parts of the world, and that all the people of God were their fellow-soldiers in this warfare.

Learn, 1. All the great persecutions that ever were in the world were raised, spirited up, and conducted by the devil. He is the grand persecutor, as well as the deceiver and accuser of the brethren. Men are his willing, spiteful instruments, but he is the chief adversary that wars against Christ and his people, Gen. iii. 15; Rev. xii. 12. 2. The design of Satan in raising persecutions against the faithful servants of God is to bring them to apostasy, by reason of their sufferings, and so to destroy their souls. 3. Sobriety and watchfulness are necessary virtues at all times, but especially in times of suffering and persecution. You must moderate your affection to worldly things, or else Satan will soon overcome you. 4. If you would overcome Satan, either as a tempter, accuser, or persecutor, you must resist him "stedfast in the faith." If your faith give way, you are gone; therefore, "above all, take the shield of faith," Eph. vi. 16. 5. The consideration of what others suffer is proper to encourage us to bear our own share in any affliction. The same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren.

10 But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you.

We come now to the conclusion of this epistle, which the apostle begins with a most weighty prayer, which,

First. He addresseth to God, as "the God of all grace," the Author and Finisher of every heavenly gift and quality; acknowledging on their behalf that God had already called them to be partakers of that eternal glory which, being his own, he had promised and settled upon them through the merit and intercession of Jesus Christ.

Secondly. You may observe what he prays for on their account. Not that they might be excused from sufferings, but that their sufferings might be moderate and short; and, "after they had suffered awhile," that God would restore them to a settled and peaceable condition, and perfect his work in them; that he would stablish them against wavering either in faith or duty, that he would strengthen them that are weak, and settle them upon Christ, the foundation, so firmly, that their union with him might be indissoluble and everlasting.

Learn, 1. That all grace is from God. It is he that restrains, converts, comforteth, and saveth men by his grace. 2. All that are called into a state of grace are called to partake of eternal glory and happiness. 3. Those that are called to be heirs of eternal life through Jesus Christ must nevertheless suffer in this world, but their sufferings will be but for a little while. 4. The perfecting, stablishing, strengthening, and settling of good people in grace, and their perseverance therein, is so difficult a work, that only "the God of all grace" can accomplish it; and therefore he is earnestly to be sought unto, by continual prayer and dependence upon his promises.

11 To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

From this doxology we may learn, that they that have obtained grace from "the God of all grace" should and will ascribe glory, dominion, and power to him "for ever and ever."

12 By Silvanus, a faithful brother unto you, as I suppose, I have written briefly, exhorting, and testifying that this is the true grace of God wherein ye stand.

Here the apostle does,

First. Recapitulate the design of his writing this epistle to them; which was, 1. To testify, and in the strongest terms to assure them, that the doctrine of salvation, which he had explained, and they had embraced, was the true account of the grace of God, foretold by the prophets and published by Jesus Christ. 2. To exhort them earnestly that, as they had embraced the Gospel, they would continue stedfast in it, notwithstanding the arts of seducers or the persecutions of enemies.

Secondly. He recommends Silvanus, the person by whom he sent them this brief epistle, as a brother that he esteemed faithful and friendly to them, and hoped they would account him so, though he was a minister of the uncircumcision.

Learn, 1. That an honourable esteem of the ministers of religion tends much to the success of their labours. When we are convinced they are faithful, we shall profit more by their ministerial services. The prejudices that some of these Jews might have against Silvanus as a minister of the Gentiles would soon wear off, when they were once convinced that he was "a faithful brother." 2. The main thing that ministers ought to aim at in their labours is, to convince their people of the certainty and excellency of the Christian religion. This the apostles did exhort and testify with all their might. 3. A firm persuasion that we are in the true way to heaven will be the best motive to stand fast and persevere therein.

13 The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you, saluteth you; and so doth Marcus my son.

St. Peter being at Babylon in Assyria when he wrote this epistle, (whither he travelled, as the apostle of the circumcision, to visit that church, which was the chief of the dispersion,) sends the salutation of that church to the other churches to whom he wrote, telling them that God had elected or chosen the Christians at Babylon out of the world to be his church, and to partake of eternal salvation through Christ Jesus, together with them and all other faithful Christians, ch. i. 2. In this salutation he particularly joins Mark the evangelist, who was then with him, and who was his son in a spiritual sense, being begotten by him to Christianity.

Learn, That all the churches of Jesus Christ ought to have a most affectionate concern one for another. They should love, and pray for, and be as helpful one to another as they possibly can.

14 Greet ye one another with a kiss of charity. Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

He exhorts them to fervent love and charity one towards another, and to express this by giving the kiss of peace, according to the common custom of those times and countries; and so concludes with a benediction, which he confines to those only "that are in Christ Jesus," united to him by faith and sound members of his mystical body. The blessing he pronounceth upon these is peace, by which he means all necessary good, all manner of prosperity. To this he adds his "Amen" in token of his earnest desire and undoubted expectation that the blessing of peace would be the portion of all the faithful.

v. 13. "She at Babylon:" so literally. Generally understood of the sister church of Babylon, as in Authorised Version.

Additional Notes.—Chap. i. 3. "Hath begotten us:" referring to the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit. "Unto a living hope:" better than Authorised Version, "lively hope." The Christian's life is a life of hope, and that hope is strong by reason of the resurrection of Christ.

i. 6. "Wherein," Authorised Version: rather, "in which."

i. 8. "Ye shall rejoice:" the reference is to the present time.

i. 13. "Wherefore:" here follow various exhortations to holy life, grounded on the knowledge of what God has done for us.

i. 14. "As children of obedience," not as Authorised Version: "This mode of expression must be referred to the more vivid way of regarding things prevalent among the Orientals, which treats intimate connection, derivation, and dependence, even in spiritual matters, as the relation of a child" (Winer).

OF THE SECOND

THE penman of this epistle appears plainly to be the same who wrote the foregoing; and whatsoever difference some learned men apprehend they discern in the style of this epistle from that of the former, this cannot be a sufficient argument to assert that it was written by Simeon, who succeeded the apostle James in the church at Jerusalem; inasmuch as he who wrote this epistle calls himself "Simon Peter, and an apostle," ver. 1, and says that he was one of the three apostles that were present at Christ's transfiguration, ver. 18; and says expressly, that he had written a former epistle to them, ch. iii. 1. [There is also an allusion in ch. i. 14, which Peter only could appropriately make: "Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath showed me." Here there is an evident reference to the Saviour's prediction of the death of Peter, recorded in Jno. xxi. 18, 19.—Probably the year 64 or 65 would not be far from the real date of this epistle. If so, it was, according to Calmet, one year only before the martyrdom of Peter, A.D. 66, and six years before the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 71. As to the persons to whom this epistle was written there is no room for doubt. They are the same with those to whom the previous epistle had been addressed, for, in ch. iii. 1, the writer says, "This second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance."] The design of this second epistle is also the same with that of the former, as is evident from the 1st verse of the 3rd chapter; whence observe, that in the things of God we have need of "precept upon precept, and line upon line," and all little enough to keep it in remembrance; and yet these are the things which should be most faithfully recorded, and frequently remembered by us. [This epistle is characterised by the same earnest and tender manner as the first, and by a peculiarly "solemn grandeur of imagery and diction." The apostle, in the two last chapters, had to meet great and dangerous errors, and the style of rebuke was appropriate to the occasion. He felt that he himself was soon to die, and, in the prospect of death, his own mind was peculiarly impressed with the solemnity and importance of coming events. The occasion required that he should state in a solemn manner what was the truth in regard to the second advent of the Lord Jesus; what great changes were to occur; what the Christian might look for hereafter; and his soul kindles with the sublime theme, and he describes in glowing imagery, and in impassioned language, the end of all things, and exhorts them to live as became those who were looking forward to so important events. The practical effect of the whole epistle is to make the mind intensely solemn, and to put it into a position of waiting for the coming of the Lord.]

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. An introduction, or preface, making way for, and leading to, what is principally designed by the apostle, ver. 1—4. II. An exhortation to advance and improve in all Christian graces, ver. 5—7. To enforce this exhortation, and engage them seriously and heartily to comply with it, he adds, 1. A representation of the very great advantage which will thereby accrue to them, ver. 8—11. 2. A promise of the best assistance the apostle was able to give to facilitate and forward this good work, ver. 12—15. 3. A declaration of the certain truth and Divine original of the Gospel of Christ, in the grace whereof they were exhorted to increase and persevere, ver. 16—21.

SIMON Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ: 2 Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, 3 According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue: 4 Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises: that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

The apostle Peter, being moved by the Holy Ghost to write once more to those who from among the Jews were turned to faith in Christ, begins this second epistle with an introduction, wherein the same persons are described, and the same blessings are desired, that are in the preface to his former letter; but there are some additions or alterations which ought to be taken notice of in all the three parts of the introduction.

First. We have here a description of the person that wrote the epistle, by the name Simon, as well as Peter, and by the title of servant as well as that of apostle. Peter, being in both epistles, seems to be the name most frequently used, and with which he may be thought to be best pleased, being given him by our Lord, upon his confessing Jesus to be Christ, the son of the living God, and the very name signifying and sealing that truth to be the fundamental article, the rock on which all must build. But the name Simon, though omitted in the former epistle, is mentioned in this, lest the total omission of that name which was given him when he was circumcised should make the Jewish believers, who were all zealous of the law, to become jealous of the apostle, as if he disclaimed and despised circumcision. He here styles himself "a servant," as well as "an apostle, of Jesus Christ." In this he may be allowed to glory, as David does, Ps. cxvi. 16. The service of Christ is the way to the highest honour, Jno. xii. 26. Christ himself is "King of kings, and Lord of lords;" and he makes all his servants "kings and priests unto God" Rev. i. 6. How great an honour is it to be the servants of this Master! This is what we cannot, without sin, be ashamed of. To triumph in being Christ's servant is very proper for those who are engaging others to enter into or abide in the service of Christ.

Secondly. We have an account of the people to whom the epistle is written. They have been described in the former epistle as "elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father," and here, as "having obtained precious faith in our Lord Jesus Christ;" for the faith here mentioned is vastly different from the false faith of the heretic, and the feigned faith of the hypocrite, and the fruitless faith of the formal professor, how orthodox soever he is. It is "the faith of God's elect," Tit. i. 1, wrought by the Spirit of God in effectual calling. Observe,

1. True saving faith is a precious grace, and that not only as it is very uncommon, very scarce even in the visible church, a very small number of true believers among a great multitude of visible professors, Mat. xxii. 14; but true faith is very excellent, and of very great use and advantage to those who have it. The just live by faith a truly Divine spiritual life. Faith procures all the necessary supports and comforts of this excellent life. Faith goes to Christ, and buys the wine and milk, Isa. lv. 1, that are the proper nourishment of the new creature. Faith buys and brings home the tried gold, the heavenly treasure that does enrich. Faith takes and puts on the white raiment, the royal robes that clothe and adorn, Rev. iii. 18.

2. Faith is alike precious in the private Christian and in the apostle; it produces the same precious effects in the one and in the other. Faith unites the

* By the Rev. Joseph Hill. Additional Notes from Barnes.

Introductory Note.—Doubts concerning the genuineness of this epistle have been held since the earliest times. It was not admitted formally into the canon until the Council of Hippo, A.D. 393, and is less often and directly quoted by early writers than the First Epistle. But the testimony for is stronger than that against its reception. It was not likely to be much quoted in early times, as it was addressed to members of the Church who had little intercourse with the rest of Christendom, on a special occasion, and for a special object. It was ultimately received into the canon, doubtless not without positive attestation from the successors of those to whom it was first addressed. With regard to the objection from the similarity of 2 Pet. 1—19 and Jude 3—16, it has been remarked that supposing this epistle copied by St. Jude, we have the strongest possible testimony to its authenticity; but if, on the other hand, the writer of this epistle copied St. Jude, it seems quite incredible that a forger, personating the chief of the apostles, should select the least important of all the apostolical weak believer to Christ as really as it does the strong one, and purifies the heart of one as truly as of another; and every sincere believer is, by his faith, justified in the sight of God, and that from all sins, Acts xiii. 39. Faith, in whomsoever it is, takes hold of the same precious Saviour, and applies the same precious promises.

3. This precious faith is obtained of God. Faith is the gift of God, wrought by the Spirit, who raised up Jesus Christ from the dead.

4. The preciousness of faith, as well as our obtaining it, is through the righteousness of Christ. The satisfactory, meritorious righteousness and obedience of Christ gives faith all its value and preciousness; and the righteousness of such a person cannot but be of infinite value to those who by faith receive it. For, 1st. This Jesus Christ is God, yea, 'our God,' as it is in the original. He is truly God, an infinite Being, who has wrought out this righteousness, and therefore it must be of infinite value. 2nd. He is the Saviour of them that believe, and as such he yielded this meritorious obedience; and therefore is it of such great benefit and advantage to them, because, as surety and Saviour, he wrought out this righteousness in their stead.

Thirdly. We have the apostolical benediction, wherein he wishes for the multiplication and increase of the Divine favour to them, and the advancement and growth of the work of grace in them; and that peace with God and in their own consciences, which cannot be without grace, may abound in them. This is the very same benediction that is in the former epistle; but here he adds,

1. An account of the way and means whereby grace and peace are multiplied; it is "through the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ." This acknowledging and believing in the only living and true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent, is the great improvement of spiritual life, or it could not be the way to life eternal, 1 Jno. xviii. 3. We have,

2. The ground of the apostle's faith in asking, and of the Christian's hope in expecting, the increase of grace. What we have already received should encourage us to ask for more. He that has begun the work of grace will perfect it. Observe, 1st. The fountain of all spiritual blessings is the Divine power of Jesus Christ, who could not discharge all the office of Mediator, unless he was God as well as man. 2nd. All things that have any relation to and influence upon the true spiritual life, the life and power of godliness, is from Jesus Christ; in him all fulness dwells, and it is from him we receive, and "grace for grace," 1 Jno. i. 16; even all that is necessary for the preserving, improving, and perfecting of grace and peace, which are called here in this verse godliness and life, according to some expositors. 3rd. Knowledge of God, and faith in him, are the channel whereby all spiritual supports and comforts are conveyed to us. But then we must own and acknowledge God as the Author of our effectual calling, for so he is here described, "Him that has called us to glory and virtue." Observe here, that the design of God in calling or converting men is to bring them to glory and virtue, that is, peace and grace, as some understand it; but many prefer the marginal rendering, 'by glory and virtue.' And so we have the effectual calling set forth as the work of "the glory and virtue," or the glorious power of God, which is described Eph. i. 19. It is the glory of God's power to convert sinners; this is that power and glory of God which are seen and experienced in his sanctuary, Ps. lxxiii. 2. This power or virtue is to be extolled by all that "are called out of darkness into marvellous light," 1 Pet. ii. 9. In the 4th verse the apostle goes on to encourage their faith and hope in looking for an increase of grace and peace, because the same glory and virtue are employed and evidenced in giving the promises of the Gospel that are exercised in our effectual calling. Observe, First. The good things which the promises make over are exceeding great. Pardon of sin is one of the blessings here intended. How great this is, all who know any thing of the power of God's anger will readily confess. And this is one of those promised favours in bestowing whereof "the power of the Lord is great," Num. xiv. 17. To pardon sins that are numerous and heinous (every one of which deserves God's wrath and curse, and that for ever) is a wonderful thing, and so called, Ps. cxix. 18. Secondly. The promised blessings of the Gospel are very precious. As the great promise of the Old Testament was the seed of the woman, the Messiah, Heb. xi. 39, so the great promise of the New Testament is the Holy Ghost, Lu. xxiv. 49. And how precious must the enlivening, enlightening, sanctifying Spirit be! Thirdly. They who receive the promises of the Gospel do partake of the Divine nature. These are renewed in the spirit of their mind after the image of God, in knowledge, righteousness, and holiness; their hearts are set for God and his service; they have a Divine temper and disposition of soul. Though the law be the ministration of death, and the letter killeth, yet the Gospel is the ministration of life, and the Spirit quickeneth those who are naturally dead in trespasses and sins. Fourthly. Those in whom the Spirit does work the Divine nature are freed from the bondage of corruption. They who are by the Spirit of grace renewed in the spirit of their mind, are translated into the liberty of the children of God; for it is the world in which corruption does reign. They who are not of the Father, but of the world, are under the power of sin. "The world lies in wickedness," 1 Jno. v. 19; and the dominion that sin has in the men of the world is through lust; their desires are to it, and therefore it rules over them. The dominion sin has over us is according to the delight we have in it.

[Here let us remark, 1. That man only, of all the dwellers on the earth, is capable of rising to this condition. The nature of all the other orders of creatures here below is incapable of any such transformation that it can be said that they become "partakers of the Divine nature." 2. It is impossible now to estimate the degree of approximation to which man may yet rise towards God, or the exalted sense in which the term may yet be applicable to him; but the prospect before the believer in this respect is most glorious. 3. Here we attempt to climb the hill of knowledge, and having gone a few steps—while the top is still lost in the clouds—we lie down and die. We look at a few things, become acquainted with a few elementary principles, make a little progress in virtue, and then all our studies and efforts are suspended, and 'we fly away.' In the future world we shall have an eternity before us to make progress in knowledge, and virtue, and holiness uninterrupted; and who can tell in what exalted sense it may yet be true that we shall be "partakers of the Divine nature," or what attainments we may yet make?]

5 And beside this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; 6 And to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; 7 And to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity.

In these words the apostle comes to the chief thing intended in this epistle, to excite and engage them to advance in grace and holiness, they having already

obtained precious faith, and been made partakers of the Divine nature. This is a very good beginning, but it is not to be rested in as if we were already perfect. The apostle had prayed that grace and peace might be multiplied to them, and now he exhorts them to press forward for the obtaining of more grace. We should, as we have opportunity, exhort those we pray for, and excite them to the use of all proper means to obtain what we desire God to bestow upon them. And they who will make any progress in religion must be very diligent and industrious in their endeavours. Without giving all diligence there is no gaining any ground in the work of holiness. They who are slothful in the business of religion will make nothing of it. We must strive if we will enter in at the strait gate, Lu. xiii. 24. Here we cannot but observe how the believer's way is marked out step by step.

First. He must get "virtue," by which some understand justice; and then the knowledge, temperance, and patience that follow, being joined with it, the apostle may be supposed to put them upon pressing after the four cardinal virtues, or the four elements that go to the making up of every virtue or virtuous action. But seeing it is a faithful saying, and constantly to be asserted, that they who have faith be careful to maintain good works, Tit. iii. 8; by virtue here we may understand strength and courage, without which the believer cannot stand up for good works by abounding and excelling in them. The righteous must be bold as a lion, Pr. xxviii. 1. A cowardly Christian, who is afraid or ashamed to profess the doctrines, or practise the duties, of the Gospel, must expect that Christ will be ashamed of him another day. Let not your hearts fail you in the evil day, but shew yourselves valiant in standing against all opposition, and resisting every enemy,—world, flesh, devil, yea, and death too. We have need of virtue while we live, and it will be of excellent use when we come to die.

Secondly. The believer must add "knowledge" to his virtue, prudence to his courage. There is a knowledge of God's name which must go before our faith, Ps. ix. 10; and we cannot approve of the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, till we know it. But there are proper circumstances for duty which must be known and observed; we must use the appointed means, and observe the accepted time. Christian prudence regards the persons we have to do with and the place and company we are in. Every believer must labour after that knowledge and wisdom that is profitable to direct, both as to the proper method and order wherein all Christian duties are to be performed, and as to the way and manner of performing them.

Thirdly. We must add "temperance" to our knowledge. We must be sober and moderate in our love to, and use of, the good things of this life; and if we have a right understanding and knowledge of outward comforts, we shall see their worth and usefulness are vastly inferior to that of spiritual mercies. Bodily exercises and bodily privileges profit but little, and therefore are to be esteemed and used accordingly. The Gospel teaches sobriety as well as honesty, Tit. ii. 12. We must be moderate in desiring and using the good things of natural life, such as meat, drink, clothes, sleep, recreations, credit, &c. An inordinate desire after these is inconsistent with an earnest desire after God and Christ; and they who take more of these than is due can neither render to God nor man what is due to them.

Fourthly. Add to temperance "patience," which must have its perfect work, or we cannot be "perfect and entire, wanting nothing," Jam. i. 4; for we are born to trouble, and must, through many tribulations, enter into the kingdom of heaven. And it is this tribulation (Rom. v. 3) which worketh patience, that is, requires the exercise and occasions the increase of this grace, whereby we bear all calamities and crosses with silence and submission, without murmuring against God, or complaining of him, but justifying him who lays all affliction upon us; owning that our sufferings are less than our sins deserve, and believing they are no more than we ourselves do need.

Fifthly. To patience we must add "godliness;" and this is the very thing which is produced by patience, for that works experience, Rom. v. 4. When Christians bear afflictions patiently they get an experimental knowledge of the loving-kindness of their heavenly Father, which he will not take from his children, even "when he visits their iniquity with the rod, and their transgression with stripes," Ps. lxxxix. 32, 33. And hereby they are brought to that child-like fear and reverential love wherein true godliness does consist. To which,

Sixthly. We must add "brotherly kindness," a tender affection to all our fellow-Christians, who are children of the same Father, servants of the same Master, members of the same family, travellers to the same country, and heirs of the same inheritance; and therefore are to be loved with a pure heart, fervently, with a love of complacency, as those who are peculiarly near and dear to us, in whom we take particular delight, Ps. xvi. 3.

Seventhly. "Charity," or a love of goodwill to all mankind, must be added to the love of delight which we have for those who are the children of God. God has made of one blood all nations, and all the children of men are partakers of the same human nature, and are all capable of the same mercies, and liable to the same afflictions; and therefore, though upon a spiritual account Christians are distinguished and dignified above those who are without Christ, yet are they to sympathise with others in their calamities, and relieve their necessities, and promote their welfare both in body and soul, as they have opportunity. Thus must all believers in Christ evidence that they are the children of God, who is good to all, but is especially good to Israel.

All the forementioned graces must be had, or we shall not be thoroughly furnished for all good works,—for the duties of the first and second table, for active and passive obedience, and for those services wherein we are to imitate God, as well as for those wherein we only obey him.

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. 9 But he that lacketh these things is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins. 10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall: 11 For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

To engage us to an industrious and unwearied pursuit of all the forementioned graces, the apostle sets forth the advantages that redound to all who as the First Epistle—to the dispersed believers in Cappadocia, Asia, &c. Its date is uncertain; Alford, Fausset, &c., place it about A.D. 68.

i. 1. "In the righteousness that cometh of our God," &c. (Tyndal). "In the justice of our God" (Rheims). Alford renders, "In the righteousness of our God," and says, "In his righteousness, which makes no difference between the one party and the other, God has given to you the like precious faith as to us."

i. 2. "By the knowing of" (Wickliffe). The vehicle of the multi-

First. More generally, ver. 9. The having these things make not "barren," or slothful, "nor unfruitful;" where, according to the style of the Holy Ghost, we must understand a great deal more than is expressed; for when it is said, concerning Ahaz, the vilest and most provoking of all the kings of Judah, that "he did not right in the sight of the Lord," 2 Kin. xvi. 2, we are to understand as much as if it had been said he did what was most offensive and abominable, as the following account of his life does show. So when it is here said that the being and abounding of all Christian graces in us will make neither inactive nor unfruitful, we are thereby to understand that it will make very zealous and lively, vigorous and active, in all practical Christianity, and eminently fruitful in the works of righteousness. These will bring much glory to God, by bringing forth much fruit among men, being fruitful "in knowledge," or the acknowledging "of our Lord Jesus Christ;" owing him to be their Lord, and evidencing themselves to be his servants, by their abounding in the work that he has given them to do. This is the necessary consequence of adding one grace to another; for where all Christian graces are in the heart, they improve and strengthen, encourage and cherish one another; so they all thrive and grow, as the apostle intimates in the beginning of the 5th verse; and wherever grace abounds there will be an abounding in good works. How desirable it is to be in such a case the apostle evidenceth, ver. 9, where he sets forth how miserable it is to be without those quickening, fructifying graces; for he who hath not, or though he pretends or seems to have the forementioned graces, does not exercise and improve them, is blind, that is, as to spiritual and heavenly things, as the next word explains it, "he cannot see far off." This present evil world he can see, and does dote upon, but has no discerning at all of the world to come, so as to be affected with the spiritual privileges and heavenly blessings thereof. He that sees the excellencies of Christianity must needs be diligent in endeavours after all those graces that are absolutely necessary for obtaining glory, honour, and immortality; but where these graces are not obtained nor endeavoured after, men are not able to look forward to the things that are but a little way off in reality, though in appearance or in their apprehension they are at a great distance, because they put them far away from them. And how wretched is their condition who are thus blind as to the awfully great things of the other world! who cannot see any thing of the reality and certainty, the greatness and nearness, of the glorious rewards God will bestow on the righteous, and the dreadful punishment he will inflict on the ungodly! But this is not all the misery of those who do not add to their faith virtue, knowledge, &c. They are as unable to look backward as forward. Their memories are slippery, and unable to retain what is past, as their sight is short, and unable to discern what is future. They forget that they have been baptised, and had the means, and been laid under the obligations, to holiness of heart and life. By baptism we are engaged in a holy war against sin, and are solemnly bound to fight against flesh, world, and devil. Often call to mind and seriously meditate on your solemn engagement to be the Lord's, and your peculiar advantages and encouragements to lay aside all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

Secondly. The apostle proposes two particular advantages that will attend or follow upon diligence in the work of a Christian: 1. Stability in grace. 2. A triumphant entrance into glory. These he brings in by resuming his former exhortation, and laying it down in other words; for what, ver. 5, is expressed by giving diligence to add to faith virtue, &c., is here expressed by "giving diligence to make our calling and election sure." Where we may observe, 1st. It is the duty of believers to make their election sure, to clear it up to themselves that they are the chosen of God. 2nd. The way to make sure their eternal election is to make out their effectual calling. None can look into the book of God's eternal counsels and decrees; but as much as whom God did predestinate, them he also called, if we can find we are effectually called, we may conclude we are chosen to salvation. 3rd. It requires a great deal of diligence and labour to make sure our calling and election. There must be a very close examination of ourselves, a very narrow search and strict inquiry, whether we are thoroughly converted, our minds enlightened, our wills renewed, and our whole souls changed, as to the bent and inclination thereof. And to come to a fixed certainty in this requires the utmost diligence, and cannot be attained and kept without Divine assistance, as we may learn from Ps. cxxxix. 23; Rom. viii. 16. But how great soever the labour is, do not think much of it, for great is the advantage you gain by it. For, First. By this you will be kept from falling, and that at all times and seasons, even in those hours of temptation that shall be on the earth; when others shall fall into heinous and scandalous sin, these shall be enabled to walk circumspectly, and keep on in the way of their duty; and when many fall into errors these shall be preserved sound in the faith, and stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. Secondly. They who are diligent in the work of religion shall have a triumphant entrance into glory. Whilst of those few who get to heaven some are scarcely saved, 1 Pet. iv. 18, with a great deal of difficulty, "even as by fire," 1 Cor. iii. 15, those who are growing in grace, and abounding in the work of the Lord, shall have an abundant entrance into the joy of their Lord, even that everlasting kingdom where Christ reigns; and they shall reign with him for ever and ever.

12 Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth. 13 Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance; 14 Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me. 15 Moreover I will endeavour that ye may be able after my decease to have these things always in remembrance.

First. The importance and advantage of progress and perseverance in grace and holiness makes the apostle to be very diligent in doing the work of a minister of Christ, that he might thereby excite and assist them to be diligent in the duty of Christians. If ministers be negligent in their work, it can hardly be expected the people will be diligent in theirs. Therefore St. Peter will not be negligent; that is, at no time or place, in no part of his work, to no part of his charge; but will be exemplarily and universally diligent, and that in the work of a remembrancer. This is the office of the best ministers, even the apostles themselves. They are the Lord's remembrancers, Isa. lxi. 6; they are especially bound to make mention of the promises, and put God in mind of his engagements to do good to his people; and they are the people's remembrancers, making mention of God's precepts, and putting them in mind of the doctrines and duties of Christianity, that they may remember God's commandments to do them. And this the apostle does, though some persons might think it needless, inasmuch as they already knew these things that he writes about, and were established in the very truth that he does insist upon. Observe.

1. We need to be put in mind of what we do already know, to prevent our forgetting it, and to improve our knowledge and reduce all to practice.

2. We must be established in the belief of the truth, that we may not be shaken by every wind of doctrine, and especially in that which is the present truth; what is the truth more peculiarly necessary for us to know in our day what belongs to our peace; and what is more especially opposed in our time. The great doctrines of the Gospel, that Jesus is the Christ, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, that those who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ shall be saved, and all who believe in God must be careful to maintain good works,—these are truths the apostles insisted on in their day; these are "faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptance" in every age of the Christian church. And as these must be constantly affirmed by ministers, Tit. iii. 8, so the people are to be well instructed and established therein; and yet must after all their attainments in knowledge, be put in mind of such things as cannot be too clearly known, nor too firmly believed. The most advanced Christians cannot, while in this world, be above ordinances, or beyond the need of those means which God has appointed and does afford. And if the people need teaching and exhortation while they are in the body, it is very meet and just that ministers should, as long as they are in this tabernacle, instruct and exhort them, and bring those truths to their remembrance that they have formerly heard, this being a proper means to stir them to be diligent and lively in a course of gospel obedience.

Secondly. The apostle, being set upon the work, tells us, ver. 14, what makes him earnest in this matter, even the knowledge he had, not only that he must certainly, but also that he must shortly, put off this tabernacle. Observe,

1. The body is but the tabernacle of the soul. It is a mean and moveable structure, whose stakes can be easily removed, and its cords presently broken.

2. This tabernacle must be put off. We are not to continue long in this earthly house. As at night we put off our clothes, and lay them by, so at death we must put off our bodies, and they must be laid up in the grave till the morning of the resurrection.

3. The nearness of death makes the apostle diligent in the business of life. Our Lord Jesus had shewn him that the time of his departure was at hand, and therefore he bestirs himself with greater zeal and diligence because the time is short; he must soon be removed from those to whom he wrote, and his ambition being that they should remember the doctrine he had delivered to them, after he himself was taken away from them, he commits his exhortation to writing. The apostle had not any great opinion of oral tradition; that was not so proper a means to reach the end he was in pursuit of. He would have them always to remember these things, and not only to keep them in mind, but also to make mention of them, as the original words do import. They who fear the Lord make mention of his name, and talk of his loving-kindness. This is the way to spread the knowledge of the Lord, and this the apostle had at heart; and they who have the written word of God are thereby put into a capacity to do this.

[We may learn from this, 1. That when a Christian grows old, and draws near to death, his sense of the value of Divine truth by no means diminishes. 2. We may learn from what Peter says here, that it is the duty of those who are drawing near to the eternal world, and who are the friends of religion, to do all they can that the truths of Christianity "may be always had in remembrance." Every man's experience of the value of religion, and the results of his examination and observation, should be regarded as the property of the world, and should not be lost. As he is about to die, he should seek, by all the means in his power, that those truths should be perpetuated and propagated. A tract may live long after the author is in the grave; and who can calculate the results which have followed the efforts of Baxter and Edwards to keep up in the world the remembrance of the truths which they deemed of so much value? This little epistle of Peter has shed light on the path of men now for eighteen hundred years, and will continue to do it until the second coming of the Saviour.]

16 For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eyewitnesses of his majesty. 17 For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. 18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

Here we have the reason of giving the foregoing exhortation, and that with so much diligence and seriousness. These things are not idle tales, or a vain thing, but of undoubted truth and vast concern. The Gospel is not a "cunningly devised fable." These are not the words of one that hath a devil, or the contrivance of any number of men, who, by cunning craftiness, endeavour to deceive. The way of salvation by Jesus Christ is eminently the counsel of God, the most excellent contrivance of the infinitely-wise Jehovah; it was he invented this way of saving sinners by Jesus Christ, whose power and coming are set forth in the Gospel, and the apostle's preaching was a making these things known.

First. The preaching of the Gospel is a making known the power of Christ, that he is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by him. He is the mighty God, and therefore can save from both the guilt and filth of sin.

Secondly. The coming of Christ also is made known by the preaching of the Gospel. He that was promised immediately after the fall of man, as in the fulness of time to be born of a woman, is now come in the flesh, and whosoever denies this is an antichrist, 1 Jno. iv. 3; he is actuated and influenced by the spirit of antichrist; but those who are the true apostles and ministers of Christ, and are directed and guided by the Spirit of Christ, they evidence that Christ is come according to the promise, which all the Old Testament believers died in the faith of. Heb. xi. 39 Christ is come in the flesh; inasmuch as those whom he undertakes to save are partakers of flesh and blood, he himself also took part of the same, that he might suffer in their nature and stead, and thereby make an atonement. This coming of Christ the Gospel is very plain and circumstantial in setting forth. But there is a second coming, which it likewise mentions, which the ministers of the Gospel ought also to make known, when he shall come in the glory of his Father, with all his holy angels, for he is appointed to be Judge both of quick and dead. He will come to judge the world in righteousness by the everlasting Gospel, and call us all to give account of all things done in the body, whether good or evil.

Thirdly. Though this Gospel of Christ has been blasphemously called a fable by one of those wretches who call themselves the successors of St. Peter, (see on Rev. ix. 21), yet our apostle proves that it is of the greatest certainty and reality, inasmuch as during our blessed Saviour's abode here on earth, when he took on him the form of a servant, and was found in fashion as a man, he sometimes manifested himself to be God, and particularly to our apostle and the two sons of Zebedee, who were eyewitnesses of his Divine majesty, when "he was transfigured before them, and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light, exceeding white as snow, so as no fuller on earth can white them." This Peter, James, and John were eyewitnesses of, and therefore might and ought to attest it; and surely their testimony is true, and therefore might what they have seen with their eyes, yea, and heard with their ears; for, besides the visible glory that Christ was vested with here on earth, there was an audible voice from heaven. Where observe,

1. What a gracious declaration was made: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" the best voice that ever came from heaven to earth,—God is well pleased with Christ, and with us in him. This is the Messiah that was promised, through whom all who believe in him shall be accepted and saved.

2. This declaration is made by God the Father, who thus publicly owns his Son, even in his state of humiliation, when he was in the form of a servant; yea, proclaims him to be his beloved Son when he was in that low condition; yea, so far as Christ's mean and low circumstances from abating the love of the Father to him, that his laying down his life is said to be one special reason of the Father's love, Jno. x. 17.

3. The design of this voice is to do our Saviour a singular honour while he was here below. "He received honour and glory from God the Father." This is the person whom God delights to honour. As he requires us to give honour and glory to his Son by confessing him to be our Saviour, so does he give glory and honour to our Saviour by declaring him to be his Son.

4. This voice is from heaven, called here the excellent glory, which still reflects a greater glory upon our blessed Saviour. This declaration is from God, the fountain of honour, and from heaven, the seat of glory, where God is most gloriously present.

5. This voice was heard, and that so as to be understood by Peter, James, and John. They not only heard a sound, as the people did, Jno. xii. 28, 29, but they understood the sense. God opens the ears and understandings of his people to receive what they are concerned to know, when others are like Paul's companions, who only heard a sound of words, Acts ix. 7, but understood not the meaning thereof, and therefore are said not to hear the voice of him that spake, Acts xxii. 9. Blessed are those who not only hear, but understand; who believe the truth, and feel the power of the voice from heaven, as he did who testified these things; and we have all the reason in the world to receive his testimony; for who would refuse to give credit to what is so circumstantially laid down as this account of the voice from heaven, of which the apostle tells us.

6. That it was heard by them in the holy mount when they were with Jesus. The place wherein God affords any peculiarly gracious manifestation of himself is thereby made holy, not with an inherent holiness, but as the ground was holy where God appeared to Moses, Ex. iii. 5, and the mountain holy on which the temple was built, Ps. lxxxvii. 1. Such places are relatively holy, and to be regarded as such, during the time that men do in themselves experience, or may, by warrant from the word, believingly expect the special presence and gracious influence of the holy and glorious God.

19 We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts: 20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation. 21 For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

Version: "There is more than a mere enumeration of these Divine graces; there is also implied how naturally they rise one out of another, and that they have a causal dependence one of another" (H. More). "Each present step prepares and makes easy the following; the following qualifies and completes the preceding" (Bengel). "Knowledge:" see Eph. v. 17.

i. 6. "Temperance:" i.e., "self-government." "Patience:" or, "patient endurance."

In these words the apostle lays down another argument to prove the truth and reality of the Gospel, and intimates that this second proof is more strong and convincing than the former, and does more unanswerably make out that the doctrine of the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ is not a mere fable, or cunning contrivance of men, but the wise and wonderful counsel of the holy and gracious God. For this is foretold by the prophets and penmen of the Old Testament, who spake and wrote under the influence, and according to the direction, of the Spirit of God. Here note,

First. The description that is given of the Scriptures of the Old Testament; they are called "a more sure word of prophecy."

It is a prophetic declaration of the power and coming, the Godhead and incarnation of our Saviour, which we have in the Old Testament. It is there foretold that "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." His power to destroy the devil and his works, and his being made of a woman, are there foretold; and the great and awful Old Testament name of God, Jehovah, as read by some, signifies only "he will be;" and that name of God, Ex. iii. 14, is rendered by many, "I will be that I will be;" and, thus understood, they point at God's being incarnate in order to the redemption and salvation of his people as what was to come. But the New Testament is a history of that whereof the Old Testament is a prophecy; "All the prophets and the law prophesied until John," Mat. xi. 13. And the evangelists and apostles have written the history of what was before delivered as prophecy. Now the accomplishment of the Old Testament by the New, and the agreeableness of the New Testament to the Old, is a full demonstration of the truth of both. Read the Old Testament as a prophecy of Christ, and with diligence and thankfulness use the New as the best exposition of the Old.

2. The Old Testament is "a more sure word of prophecy." It is so to the Jews, who received it as the oracles of God. Following prophets confirmed what had been delivered by those who went before; and these prophecies had been written by the express command, and preserved by the special care, and many of them fulfilled by the wonderful providence of God, and therefore were more certain to them who had all along received and read the Scriptures than the apostle's account of this voice from heaven. Moses and the prophets do more powerfully persuade than even miracles themselves, Lu. xvi. 31. How firm and sure should our faith be, who have such a firm and sure word to rest upon! All the prophecies of the Old Testament are more sure and certain to us, who have the history of the exact and most minute accomplishment of them.

Secondly. The encouragement the apostle gives us to search the Scriptures. He tells us we do well if we take heed to them; that is, apply our minds to understand the sense, and our hearts to believe, the truth, of this sure word; yea, to bend ourselves to it, that we may be moulded and fashioned by it. The word is that form of doctrine into which we must be cast, Rom. vi. 17; that formulary of knowledge, Rom. ii. 20, by which we are to regulate our thoughts and sentiments, our words and confessions, our whole life and conversation. If we thus apply ourselves to the word of God, we certainly do well in all respects what is pleasing to God and profitable to ourselves, and is indeed but a paying that regard which is due to the oracles of God. But in order to this giving heed to the word, the apostle suggests some things that are of singular use to those who would attend to the Scriptures to any good purpose.

1. They must account and use the Scripture as a light which God has sent into, and set up in, the world, to dispel that darkness which is upon the face of the whole earth. The word is a lamp to the feet of those who use it aright; this discovers the way wherein men ought to walk; this is the means whereby we come to know the way of life.

2. They must acknowledge their own darkness. This world is a place of error and ignorance, and every man in the world is naturally without that knowledge which is necessary in order to attain eternal life.

3. If ever men are made wise to salvation, it is by the shining of the word of God into their hearts. Natural notions of God are not sufficient for fallen man, who does at best actually know a great deal less, and yet does absolutely need to know a great deal more, of God than Adam did while he continued innocent.

4. When the light of the Scripture is darted into the blind mind and dark understanding by the Holy Spirit of God, then the spiritual day does dawn, and the day-star does arise in that soul. This enlightening of a dark, benighted mind is like the daybreak that improves and advances, spreads and diffuses itself through the whole soul, till it makes perfect day, Ps. iv. 18. It is a growing knowledge; they who are thus way enlightened never think they know enough, till they come to know as they are known. To give heed to this light must needs be the interest and duty of all, and all that do truth come to this light, while evil-doers keep at a distance from it.

5. It may apply also to the progress of truth in the world as well as in the hearts of individuals. The period referred to here by the approaching day that is to diffuse the light may be when the Saviour shall return in the full revelation of his glory—the splendour of his kingdom. Then all will be clear. Till that time we should search the prophetic records, and seek to strengthen our faith, and we comfort our hearts, by the predictions of the future glory of his reign. Whether this refers, as some suppose, to his reign on earth, either personally or by the principles of his religion universally prevailing,—or, as others suppose, to the brighter revelations of heaven when he shall come to receive his people to himself,—it is equally clear that a brighter time than any that has yet occurred is to dawn on our race, and equally true that we should regard the prophecies, as we do the morning star, as the cheering harbinger of day.

Thirdly. The apostle lays down one thing as previously necessary in order to our giving heed to, and getting good by, the Scriptures, and that is, the knowing that all prophecy is of Divine original. Now this important truth he not only asserts, but proves.

1. Observe that no Scripture prophecy is of "private interpretation," or a man's own proper opinion, an explication of his own mind, but the revelation of the mind of God. This was the difference between the prophets of the Lord and the false prophets who have been in the world. The prophets of the Lord did not speak or do any thing of their own mind, as Moses, the chief of them, says expressly, Num. xvi. 28, "I have not done any of the works" (nor delivered any of the statutes and ordinances) "of my own mind." But false prophets "speak a vision of their own heart, not out of the mouth of the Lord," Jer. xxiii. 16. The prophets and penmen of the Scripture spake and wrote what was the mind of God; and though, when under the influence and guidance of the Spirit, it may well be supposed that they were willing to reveal and record such things, yet it is because God would have them spoken and written. But though the Scripture be not the effusions of man's own private opinion or inclination, but the revelation of the mind and will of God, yet every private man ought to search it, and come to understand the sense and meaning thereof.

2. This important truth of the Divine original of the Scriptures, that what is contained in them is the mind of God and not of man, is to be known and owned by all that will give heed to the sure word of prophecy. That the

i. 8, 9. Reasons for the above exhortations—(1) the good result of these graces; (2) the evil result of their absence. Not "in the knowledge" but "towards the knowledge." "These virtues are all regarded as so many steps in advancing towards the knowledge of Christ, which is the great complex end of the Christian life" (Alford).

i. 10, 11. The exhortations are further pressed on account of the blessed results which will hereafter follow their acceptance. "To make your calling," &c.: the Greek is in the middle voice, signifying, Scriptures are the word of God is not only an article of the true Christian's faith, but it is also matter of science or knowledge. As a man doth not barely believe, but know assuredly, that that very person is his particular friend in whom he sees all the proper, peculiar, distinguishing marks and characters of his friend—so the Christian knows that book to be the word of God, in and upon which he sees all the proper marks and characters of a divinely inspired book. He tastes a sweetness, and feels a power, and sees a glory in it truly Divine.

3. The Divinity of the Scriptures must be known and acknowledged, in the first place, before men can profitably use them, before they can give good heed to them. To call off our minds from all other writings, and apply them in a peculiar manner to these as the only certain and infallible rule, does necessarily require our being fully persuaded that these are Divinely inspired, and contain what is truly the mind and will of God. Now, seeing it is so absolutely necessary that persons be fully persuaded of the Scripture's Divine original, the apostle (ver. 21) tells us how the Old Testament came to be compiled, and that, 1st. Negatively, "It came not by the will of man." Neither the things themselves that are recorded, and make up the several parts of the Old Testament, are the opinions of men, nor was the will of any of the prophets or penmen of the Scriptures the rule or reason why any of those things were written which make up the canon of Scripture. 2nd. Affirmatively: "Holy men of God spake as moved by the Holy Ghost." Observe, First. They were "holy men of God," who were employed about that book which we receive as the word of God. If Balaam and Caiaphas, and others, who were destitute of holiness, had any thing of the spirit of prophecy upon occasion, yet such sort of persons were not employed to write any part of the Scriptures for the use of the church of God. All the penmen of the Scriptures were holy men of God. Secondly. These holy men were "moved by the Holy Ghost" in what they delivered as the mind and will of God. The Holy Ghost is the supreme agent, the holy men are but instruments. 1st. The Holy Ghost inspires and dictates to them what they were to deliver of the mind of God. 2nd. He powerfully excites and effectually engages them to speak and write what he had put into their mouths. 3rd. He does so wisely and carefully assist and direct them in the delivery of what they had received from him, that they were effectually secured from any the least mistake in expressing what they revealed. So that the very words of Scripture are to be accounted the words of the Holy Ghost; and all the plainness and simplicity, all the power and virtue, and all the elegance and propriety of the very words and expressions, are to be regarded by us as proceeding from God. Mix faith, therefore, with what you find in the Scriptures; esteem and reverence your Bible as a book written by holy men,—inspired, influenced, and assisted by the Holy Ghost.

The apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, exhorted them to proceed and advance in the Christian race, he now comes to remove, as much as in him lay, what he could not but apprehend would hinder their complying with his exhortation. He therefore gives them fair warning of false teachers, by whom they might be in danger of being seduced. To prevent this, I. He describes these seducers as impious in themselves, and very pernicious to others, ver. 1—3. II. He assures them of the punishment that shall be inflicted on them, ver. 4—6. III. He tells us how contrary the method is which God takes with those who fear him, ver. 7—9. IV. He fills up the rest of the chapter with a farther description of those seducers of whom he would have them beware.

BUT there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction. 2 And many shall follow their pernicious ways; by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. 3 And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you:

In the end of the former chapter there is mention made of "holy men of God," that lived in the times of the Old Testament, and were used as the amanuenses of the Holy Ghost, in writing the sacred oracles; but in the beginning of this he tells us they had, even in that time, false prophets in the church as well is true.

First. In all ages of the church, and under all dispensations, when God sends true prophets, the devil sends some to seduce and deceive; false prophets in the Old Testament, and false Christs, and false apostles, and seducing teachers, in the New. Concerning these observe, 1. Their business is to bring in destructive errors, even "damnable heresies," as the business of teachers sent of God is to shew the way of truth, even the true way to everlasting life. There are damnable heresies as well as damnable practices; and false teachers are industrious to spread pernicious errors. 2. Damnable heresies are commonly brought in privily, under the cloak and colour of truth. They who introduce destructive heresies "deny the Lord that bought them." They reject and refuse to hear and learn of the great Teacher sent from God, though he is the only Saviour and Redeemer of men, who paid a price sufficient to redeem as many worlds of sinners as there are sinners in the world. 4. They who bring in errors destructive to others, bring "swift," and therefore sure, "destruction" upon themselves. Self-destroyers are soon destroyed; and those who are so hardened as to propagate errors destructive to others shall surely and suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy.

Secondly. He proceeds in the second verse to tell us the consequence with respect to others; and here we may learn, 1. Corrupt leaders seldom fail of many to follow them: though the way of error is a pernicious way, yet many are ready to walk therein. Men drink in iniquity like water, and are pleased to live in error. "The prophets prophesy falsely, and the people love to have it so." 2. The spreading of error will bring up an evil report on the way of truth; that is, the way of salvation by Jesus Christ, who is "the way, the truth, and the life." Christian religion is from the God of truth as the author, and leads to true happiness in the enjoyment of the true God as the end, and works truth in the inward part as the means of acceptably serving God; and yet this way of truth is traduced and blasphemed by those who embrace and advance destructive errors. This the apostle has foretold as that should certainly come to pass. Let us not be offended at any thing of this in our day, but take care that we give no occasion to the enemy to blaspheme the holy name whereby we are called, or speak evil of that way whereby we hope to be saved.

Thirdly. Observe, in the next place, the method seducers take to draw disciples after them. They use feigned words—they flatter; and, by good words and fair speeches, deceive the hearts of the simple, inducing them to give in entirely into the opinions which these seducers endeavour to propagate, and sell and deliver themselves over to the instruction and government of these false teachers, who make a gain of them whom they make their proselytes, serving themselves and making some advantage of them; for all this is through covetousness, with a desire and design to get more wealth, or credit, or commendation, by increasing the number of their followers. The faithful ministers of Christ, who shew men the way of truth, desire the profit and advantage of their followers, that they may be saved; but these seducing teachers desire and design only their own temporal advantage and worldly grandeur.

— Whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. 4 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment; 5 And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; 6 And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly;

Men are apt to think that a reprieve is the forerunner of a pardon; and if judgment be not speedily executed, it is, or will be, certainly reversed. But the apostle tells us, that how successful and prosperous soever false teachers may be, and that for a time, yet their judgment lingereth not. God hath determined long ago how he will deal with them. Such unbelievers who endeavour to turn others from the faith, are condemned already, and the wrath of God abideth on them. The righteous Judge will speedily take vengeance; the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste. [Mr. Blackwell observes that this is a most beautiful figure, representing the vengeance that shall destroy such incorrigible sinners as an angel of judgment pursuing them on the wing, continually approaching nearer and nearer, and in the mean time keeping a watchful eye upon them, that he may at length discharge an unerring blow.—Doddridge.] To prove this assertion, here are several examples of the righteous judgment of God in taking vengeance on sinners proposed to our serious consideration.

First. See how God dealt with the angels that sinned. Observe, 1. No excellency will exempt a sinner from punishment. If the angels, who excel us vastly in strength and knowledge, violate the law of God, the sentence which that law does award shall be executed upon them, and that without mercy or mitigation, for God did not spare them. Whence observe, 2. By how much the more excellent the offender, by so much the more severe the punishment. These angels, who had the advantage of men as to the dignity of their nature, are immediately punished. There is no sparing them for a few days, no favour at all shewn them. 3. Sin does debase and degrade the persons who commit it. The angels of heaven are cast down from the height of their excellency, and divested of all their glory and dignity, upon their disobedience. Whoever sins against God does a manifest hurt to himself. 4. They that rebel against the God of heaven shall all be sent down to hell. There is no place or state between the height of glory and the depth of misery in which they shall be allowed to rest. If creatures sin in heaven, they must suffer in hell. 5. Sin is the work of darkness, and darkness is the wages of sin. The darkness of misery and torment follows the darkness of sin. They who will not walk according to the light and direction of God's law shall be deprived of the light of God's countenance, and the comforts of his presence. 6. As sin binds men over to punishment, so misery and torment hold men under punishment. The darkness which is their misery keeps them so as that they cannot get away from their torment. 7. The last degree of torment is not till the day of judgment. The sinning angels, though in hell already, yet are reserved to the judgment of the great day.

Secondly. See how God dealt with the old world, even in much the same way that he dealt with the angels. He spared not the old world. Here observe, 1. The number of offenders signifies no more to procure any favour than the quality. If the sin be universal, the punishment shall likewise extend to all. But, 2. If there be but a few righteous, they shall be preserved. God does not destroy the good with the bad. He doth in wrath remember mercy. 3. They who are preachers of righteousness in an age of universal corruption and degeneracy, holding forth the word of life in an unblameable and exemplary conversation, shall be preserved in a time of general destruction. 4. God can make use of those creatures as the instruments of his vengeance in punishing sinners which he at first made and appointed for their service and benefit. He destroyed the whole world by water. But observe, 5. What is the procuring cause of this,—it was a world of ungodly men. Ungodliness puts men out of Divine protection, and exposes them to utter destruction.

Thirdly. See how God dealt with Sodom and Gomorrah. Though they were situated in a country like the garden of the Lord, yet if in such a fruitful soil they shall abound in sin, God can soon turn a fruitful land into barrenness, and a well-watered country into dust and ashes. Observe, 1. No political union or confederacy can keep off judgments from a sinful people. Sodom, and the neighbouring cities, were no more secured by their regular government than the angels by the dignity of their nature, or the old world by their vast number. 2. God can make use of contrary creatures to punish incorrigible sinners. He destroys the old world by water, and Sodom by fire. He that keeps fire and water from hurting his people, Isa. xlii. 2. can make either to destroy his enemies, therefore they are never safe. 3. Most heinous sins bring most grievous judgments. They who are abominable in their vices were remarkable for their plagues. They who are sinners exceedingly before the Lord must expect the most dreadful vengeance. 4. The punishment of sinners in former ages is designed for the example of those who come after, not only in the time of therefore, "to make for your part," or "on your side," "as far as depends on you." To make absolutely and finally is God's only. "Ministered;" rather, "furnished;" the same word as in verse 5, where it is rendered "add to." "Furnish forth your own lives with these Christian graces, so shall be furnished to you," &c. (Alford).

i. 14. "Shortly;" better, "swift is the putting off," &c., referring to the manner, not time of his death. Christ had foretold the one, not the other (John xxi. 18, 19). Death would come to the apostle at once, not by failing health or long sickness; therefore he must not trust to the effect of a dying appeal to strengthen their faith and knowledge.

i. 16—18. The apostle recalls the wonders of the transfiguration which he, James, and John witnessed, to confirm their faith in the Lord's power and glory (Matt. xvii. 1—7).

i. 19. The apparent meaning of the Authorised Version, that the living, but follow them in their course and way of living. Men who live ungodly must see what they are to expect if they go on still in a course of impiety. Let us take warning by all the instances of God's taking vengeance, which are recorded for our admonition, and to prevent our promising ourselves impunity, though we go on in a course of sin.

7 And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: 8 (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds;) 9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished:

When God sends destruction on the ungodly he commands deliverance for the righteous; and if he rain fire and brimstone on the wicked, he will cover the head of the just, and they shall be hid in the day of his anger. This we have an instance of in his preserving Lot. Where observe,

First. The character given of Lot. He is called a just man. This he was as to the generally prevailing bent of his heart, and through the main of his conversation. God does not account men just or unjust from one single act, but from the general course of life. And here is a just man in the midst of a most corrupt and profligate generation, universally gone off from all good. He does not follow the multitude to do evil, but in a city of injustice he walks uprightly.

Secondly. The impression the sins of others have upon this righteous man. Though the sinner takes pleasure in his wickedness, it is grief and vexation to the soul of the righteous. In bad company we cannot escape either guilt or grief. Let the sins of others be a trouble to us, otherwise it will not be possible for us to keep ourselves pure.

Thirdly. Here is particular mention of the duration and continuance of this good man's grief and vexation; it was "from day to day." Being accustomed to see and hear their wickedness did not reconcile him to it, nor abate the horror that was occasioned by it. This is the righteous man that God preserved from the desolating judgment that destroyed all round about him. And from this instance we are taught to argue that God knows how to deliver his people, and punish his enemies. It is here presupposed that the righteous must have their temptations and trials. The devil and his instruments will thrust sore at them, that they may fall; and if we will get to heaven, it must be through many tribulations: it is then our duty to reckon upon and prepare for them. Observe here, 1. The Lord knows them that are his. He has set apart him that is godly for himself, and if there is but one in five cities, he knows him; and where there is a greater number he cannot be ignorant, or overlook any one of them. 2. The wisdom of God is never at a loss about ways and means to deliver his people. They are often utterly at a loss, and can see no way; he can discover a great many. 3. The deliverance of the godly is the work of God; that which he concerns himself in, both his wisdom to contrive the way, and his power to work out the deliverance out of temptation, to prevent their falling into sin, and their being ruined by their troubles. And surely, if he can deliver out of temptation, he can keep from falling into it, if he did not see such trials to be necessary. 4. God makes a very great difference in his dealings with the godly and the wicked. When he saves his people from destruction he delivers over his enemies to deserved ruin. The unjust has no share in the salvation God works out for the righteous. The wicked are reserved to the day of judgment. Here we see, 1st. There is a day of judgment. God has appointed a day wherein he will judge the world. 2nd. The preservation of impenitent sinners is only a reserving them to the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God.

10 But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government. Presumptuous are they, selfwilled, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities. 11 Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord. 12 But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption; 13 And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure to riot in the day time. Spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you; 14 Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin; beguiling unstable souls: an heart they have exercised with covetous practices; cursed children: 15 Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness; 16 But was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbad the madness of the prophet.

written word of God, the "word of prophecy," is more sure than the voice of God from heaven, must be erroneous. The most probable interpretation of "a more sure word," &c., or, rather, as the Greek, "the word of prophecy more sure," is that the apostle means that the word of prophecy is to him and his fellow-believers more sure since the manifestation and recognition of Christ's glory on the mount (Psa. ii. 7), which was a fulfilment of prophecy. Of the latter part of this verse, the rendering of Tregelles seems best:

17 These are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest; to whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever. 18 For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error. 19 While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage. 20 For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning. 21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them. 22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, The dog is turned to his own vomit again; and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.

The apostle's design being to warn us of, and arm us against, seducers, he now returns to discourse more particularly of them, and give us an account of their character and conduct, which does abundantly justify the righteous Judge of the world in reserving them in an especial manner for the most severe and heavy doom,—as Cain is taken under special protection, that he might be kept for uncommon vengeance. But why will God deal thus with these false teachers? This he shews in what follows:—

First. These "walk after the flesh;" they follow the devices and desires of their own hearts. They give up themselves to the conduct of their own fleshly mind, refusing to make their reason stoop to Divine revelation, and bring every thought to the obedience of Christ; they in their lives act directly contrary to God's righteous precepts, and comply with the demands of corrupt nature. Evil opinions are often accompanied with evil practices; and they who are for propagating error are for improving in wickedness. They will not sit down contented in the measure of iniquity to which they have attained, nor is it enough for them to stand up, and maintain, and defend what wickedness they have already committed; but they walk after the flesh, they go on in their sinful course, and increase unto more ungodliness, and greater degrees of impurity and uncleanness too. They also pour contempt on those whom God has set in authority over them, and requires them to honour; these, therefore, despise the ordinance of God; and we need not wonder at it, for they are bold and daring, obstinate and refractory, and will not only in their hearts despise, but with their tongues will utter slanderous and reproachful words of those who are set over them.

Secondly. This he aggravates by setting forth the very different conduct of more excellent creatures, even the angels. Of whom observe, 1. They are greater in power and might, and that even than those who are clothed with authority and power among the sons of men, and much more than those false teachers who are slanderous revilers of magistrates and governors. The good angels vastly excel us in all natural and moral excellencies,—in strength, understanding, and holiness too. 2. Good angels are accusers of sinful creatures, either of their own kind or ours, or both. They who are allowed to behold the face of God, and stand before his throne, cannot but have a zeal for his honour, and accuse and blame those who dishonour him. 3. Angels bring their accusations of sinful creatures before the Lord. They do not publish their faults and tell their crimes to their fellow-creatures in a way of calumny and slander, but it is before the Lord, who is the Judge, and will be the Avenger of all impiety and injustice. 4. The good angels mingle no bitter revilings, or base reproaches, with any of their accusations or charges they bring against the wickedest and worst of criminals. Let us, who pray that God's will may be done "on earth as it is in heaven," imitate the angels in this particular. If we complain of wicked men, let it be to God, and that not with rage and reviling, but with compassion and composure of mind, that they may evidence that we belong to Him who is meek and merciful.

Thirdly. The apostle, having shewn in the 11th verse how unlike seducing teachers are to the most excellent creatures, proceeds, ver. 12, to shew how like they are to the most inferior. They are like the horse and mule, which have no understanding; they are as natural brute beasts, "made to be taken and destroyed." Men, under the power of sin, are so far from observing Divine revelation, that they do not exercise reason, or act according to the direction thereof: they walk by sight, and not by faith, and judge of things according to their senses; as they represent things pleasant and agreeable, so they must be approved and esteemed. Brute creatures follow the instinct of their sensitive appetite, and sinful man follows the inclination of his carnal mind. These refuse to employ the understanding and reason God has given them, and so are ignorant of what they might and ought to know. And therefore observe,

1. Ignorance is the cause of evil speaking. And, 2. Destruction will be the effect of it. These persons shall be utterly destroyed in their own corruption. Their vices not only expose them to the wrath of God in another world, but many times bring them to misery and ruin in this life. And surely such sort of impudent offenders, who glory in their shame, and to whom openness in sin is an improvement of the pleasure of sinning, do most justly deserve all the plagues of this life and the pains of the next in the greatest extremity; therefore whatever they meet with is the just reward of their unrighteousness. Such sinners, who sport themselves in mischief, deceive themselves, and disgrace all they belong to; for by one sort of sins they prepare themselves for another; and their extravagant feastings, their intemperance in eating and drinking, bring them to commit all manner of lewdness, so that their eyes are "full of adultery." Their wanton looks shew their own impure lusts, and are designed and directed to enkindle the

"Whereunto ye do well to take heed (as unto a light shining in a dark place, until the day have dawned and the morning star arisen) in your hearts." For, as Fausset remarks, the day has already dawned in the heart of believers; they only wait for its visible manifestation at Christ's coming.

i. 20, 21. "Private" in verse 20 is explained "by the will of man" in verse 21. The prophets themselves could not always fully interpret the prophecies they spoke, because they spoke not of like in others; and this is what they cannot cease from. The heart is insatiate in lusting, and the eye incessant in looking after what may gratify their unclean desires. And they who are themselves impudent and incessant in sin are very diligent, and often successful, in deceiving others, and drawing others into the same excess of riot. But here observe who they are who are in the greatest danger of being led away into error and impiety, even the unstable. Those whose hearts are not established with grace are easily turned into the way of sin, or else such sort of sensual wretches will not be able to prevail upon them; for these are not only riotous and lascivious, but covetous also; and these kind of practices their hearts are exercised with. They pant after riches, and the desire of their souls is to the wealth of this world. It is a considerable part of their work to contrive to get wealth; in this their hearts are exercised, and then they execute their projects. And if men abandon themselves to all sorts of lusts we cannot wonder that the apostle should call them "cursed children;" for they are liable to the curse of God denounced against such ungodly, unrighteous men, and they bring a curse upon all that hearken and adhere to them.

Fourthly. The apostle, ver. 15, 16, proves that they are cursed children, even such covetous persons as the Lord abhors, by shewing,

1. They have "forsaken the right way," and it cannot be but such self-seekers must be out of the right way, which is a self-denying way.

2. They are gone into a wrong way; they have erred and strayed from the way of life, and gone over into the path which leads to death, and takes hold of hell; and this he makes out by shewing it to be "the way of Balaam the son of Bosor." 1st. That is a way of unrighteousness into which men are led by the wages of unrighteousness. 2nd. Outward temporal good things are the wages sinners expect and promise themselves, though they are often disappointed. 3rd. The inordinate love of the good things of this world turns men out of the way which leads to the unspeakably better things of another life. Love of riches and honour turned Balaam out of the way of his duty, although he knew that the way he took displeased the Lord. 4th. They who from the same principle are guilty of the same practices with notorious sinners, are, in the judgment of God, the followers of such vile offenders, and therefore must reckon upon being at last where they are. They shall have their portion with those in another world whom they imitated in this. 5th. Heinous and hardened sinners do sometimes meet with rebukes for their iniquity. God stops them in their way, and does open the mouth of conscience, or by some startling providence startle and affright them. 6th. Though some more uncommon and extraordinary rebukes may for a little while cool men's courage, and hinder their violent progress in the way of sin, it will not make them forsake the way of iniquity, and go over into the way of holiness. If rebuking a sinner for his iniquity would have made a man return to his duty, surely the rebuke of Balaam must have produced this effect; for here was a surprising miracle wrought. The dumb ass, in whose mouth no man can expect to meet with reproof, is enabled to speak, and that with a human voice, and to her owner and master, who is here called a prophet, for the Lord appeared, and spake sometimes to him, Num. xxii. 23, 24. But indeed he was among the prophets of the Lord as Judas among the apostles of Christ. And she exposes the madness of his conduct, and opposes his going on in this evil way, and yet all in vain. They who will not yield to usual methods of reproof will be but little influenced by miraculous appearances to turn them from their sinful courses. He is indeed restrained from actually cursing the people, but he had so strong a desire after the honours and riches that were promised him, that he went as far as he could, and did his uttermost to get from under the restraint that was upon him.

Fifthly. The apostle proceeds in the 17th verse to a farther description of seducing teachers, whom he sets forth as "wells" or fountains "without water." Observe,

1. Ministers should be as wells or fountains where the people may find instruction, direction, and comfort. But,

2. False teachers have nothing of this to impart to those who consult them. The word of truth is the water of life, which refreshes the souls that receive it; but these deceivers are set upon spreading and promoting error, and therefore are set forth as empty, because there is no truth in them. In vain, then, are all our expectations of being fed and filled with knowledge and understanding by those who are themselves ignorant and empty. They are also "clouds carried with a tempest." When we see a cloud we expect a refreshing shower from it; but these are clouds which yield no rain, for they are driven with the wind, but not of the Spirit, but the stormy wind or tempest of their own ambition and covetousness. They espouse and spread those opinions that will procure most applause and advantage to themselves. And as clouds obstruct the light of the sun, and darken the air, so do these darken counsel by words without knowledge, and wherein there is no truth. And seeing these men are for promoting darkness in this world, it is very just that the mist of darkness should be their portion in the next. Utter darkness was prepared for the devil, the great deceiver, and his angels, those instruments that he uses to turn men away from the truth; and therefore for them it is reserved, and that for ever. The fire of hell is everlasting, and the smoke of the bottomless pit riseth up for ever and ever. And it is just with God to deal thus with them, because, 1st. They allure those they deal with, and draw them into a net, or catch them as men do fish. And, 2nd. It is with "great swelling words of vanity," lofty expressions, which have a great sound, but little sense. 3rd. They work upon the corrupt affections and carnal fleshly lusts of men, proposing what is grateful to them. And, 4th. They seduce persons who in reality avoided and kept at a distance from those who spread and those who embraced hurtful and destructive errors. Observe, First. By application and industry men attain a skillfulness and dexterity in promoting error; they are as artful and as successful as the fisher that makes angling his daily employment. The business of these men is to draw disciples after them, and in their methods and management there are some things worth observing, how they suit their bait to those they desire to catch. Secondly. Erroneous teachers have a peculiar advantage to win men over to them, because they have sensual pleasures to take them with; whereas the ministers of Christ put men upon self-denial, and the mortifying of those lusts that others gratify and please. Wonder not, therefore, that truth prevails no more, or that errors spread so much. Thirdly. Persons who have for awhile adhered to the truth, and kept clear of errors, may, by the subtlety and industry of seducers, be so far deceived as to fall into these errors they had for awhile clean escaped. Be therefore always upon your guard, maintain a godly jealousy of yourselves, search the Scriptures, pray for the Spirit to instruct and establish you in the truth, walk humbly with God, and watch against every thing that may provoke him to give you up to a reprobate mind, "that you may not be taken with the fair and specious pretences of these false teachers, who promise liberty to all that will hearken to them, but not true Christian liberty for the service of God, but a licentiousness in sin, to follow the devices and desires of their own hearts. To prevent these men's gaining proselytes, he tells us that, in the midst of all their talk of liberty, they themselves are the vilest slaves, for they are the servants of corruption. Their own lusts have gotten a complete victory over them, and they are actually in bondage to them, making provision for the flesh to satisfy its cravings, and comply with its directions, and obey its commands.

Their minds and hearts are so far corrupted and depraved that they have neither power nor will to refuse the task that is imposed on them. They are conquered and captivated by their spiritual enemies, and yield their members servants of unrighteousness. And what a shame is it to be overcome and commanded by those who are themselves the servants of corruption and slaves to their own lusts! This consideration should prevent our being led away by these seducers. And to this he adds another, ver. 20; it is not only a shame and disgrace to be seduced by those who are themselves the slaves of sin, and led captive by the devil at his pleasure, but it is a real detriment to those who have clean escaped from them who live in error, for hereby "their latter end is made worse than their beginning." Here we see, 1st. It is an advantage to escape the pollutions of the world, to be kept from gross and scandalous sins, though men are not thoroughly converted, and savingly changed; for hereby we are kept from grieving those who are truly serious, and emboldening those who are openly profane. Whereas, if we run with others to the same excess of riot, and abandon ourselves to the sins of the age, we afflict and dishearten those who endeavour to walk as becomes the Gospel, and strengthen the hands of those who are already engaged in open rebellion against the Most High, as well as alienate ourselves more from God, and harden our hearts against him. 2nd. Some men are for a time kept from the pollutions of the world by the knowledge of Christ, who are not savingly renewed in the spirit of their mind. A religious education has restrained many whom the grace of God has not renewed. If we receive the light of the truth, and have a notional knowledge of Christ in our head, it may be of some present service to us; but we must receive the love of the truth, and hide God's word in our hearts, or it will not sanctify and save us. 3rd. Those who have for a time escaped the pollutions of the world are at first ensnared and entangled by false teachers. They first perplex men with some plausible and specious objections against the truths of the Gospel, and the more ignorant and unstable are hereby made to stagger, and brought to question the truth of doctrines they have received, because they cannot solve all the difficulties, nor answer all the objections, that are urged by these seducers. 4th. When men are once entangled they are easily overcome; therefore should Christians keep close to the word of God, and watch against those who seek to perplex and bewilder them; and that because, if men that have once escaped "are again entangled, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning."

Sixthly. The apostle does in the last two verses of the chapter set himself to prove that a state of apostasy is worse than a state of ignorance; for this is a condemning the way of righteousness after they have had some knowledge of it, and expressed some liking to it. This carries in it a declaring that they have found some iniquity in the way of righteousness, and some falsehood in the word of truth. Now to bring up such an evil report upon the good way of God, and such a false charge against the way of truth, must necessarily expose to the heaviest condemnation. The misery of such deserters of Christ and his Gospel is more unavoidable and more intolerable than that of other offenders; for, 1. God is more highly provoked by them who do by their conduct despise the Gospel, as well as disobey the law, and do reproach and pour contempt upon God and his grace. 2. The devil does more narrowly watch, and more closely confine, those whom he has recovered, after they had once gone off from him, and professed to be the followers of the Lord Jesus Christ, Mat. xii. 45. They are kept under a stronger guard; and no wonder it should be so, when they have licked up their own vomit again, returning to the same errors and impieties that they had once cast off, and seemed to detest and loathe, and wallow in that filthiness from which they appeared once to be really cleansed. Well, if the Scripture gives such an account of Christianity on the one hand, and of sin on the other, as we have here in these two verses, we certainly ought highly to approve of the former, and persevere therein, because it is a way of righteousness, and a holy commandment; and to loathe and keep at the greatest distance from the latter, because it is set forth as most offensive and abominable.

[This passage is often quoted to prove "the possibility of falling from grace, and from a very high degree of it too." But it is one of the last passages in the Bible that should be adduced to prove that doctrine. The true point of this passage is to shew that the persons referred to never were changed; that whatever external reformation might have occurred, their nature remained the same; and that when they apostatized from their outward profession, they merely acted out their nature, and shewed that in fact there had been no real change. This passage will prove, what there are abundant facts to confirm, that persons may reform externally, and then return again to their former corrupt habits; it can never be made to prove that one true Christian will fall away and perish. It will also prove that we should rely on no mere external reformation, no outward cleansing, as certain evidence of piety. Thousands who have been externally reformed have ultimately shown that they had no religion, and there is nothing in mere outward reformation that can fit us for heaven. God looks upon the heart, and it is only the religion that has its seat there that can secure our final salvation.]

I. The apostle, drawing towards the conclusion of his second epistle, begins this last chapter of it with repeating the account of his design and scope in writing a second time to them, ver. 1, 2. II. He proceeds to mention one thing that induced him to write this second epistle, namely, the coming of scoffers, whom he describes, ver. 3-7. III. He instructs and establishes them in the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ to judgment, ver. 8-10. IV. He sets forth the use and improvement which Christians ought to make of Christ's second coming, and that dissolution and renovation of things which will accompany that solemn coming of our Lord, ver. 11-18.

and Saviour :

HIS second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you; in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance: 2 That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord themselves, but through the power of the Holy Spirit (1 Peter i. 10-12). "For prophecy was never (not as Authorised Version, 'in old time') borne (to us) by the will of man, but holy men of God (one MS. reads 'men from God') spoke, being borne along by the Holy Spirit." (See Note on 2 Tim. iii. 16.)

ii. This chapter relates to false teachers, their ungodliness and punishment.

ii. 1. "But:" in contrast to the true prophet's just spoken of. Not "damnable heresies," as Authorised Version; rather, "heresies of destruction"—i.e., leading to destruction. "Who bought them?" "By the use of this particular predication for Christ here, those heresies seem especially to be aimed at which denied or explained away the virtue of the propitiatory sacrifice of our Lord, by which he has bought us to himself" (Alford). Not "and bring," but "bringing upon themselves," &c.

ii. 2. "Licentious," not "pernicious," as Authorised Version.

That the apostle might the better reach his end in writing this epistle, which is to make them steady and constant in a fiducial and practical remembrance of the doctrine of the Gospel, he,

First, Expresses his special affection and tenderness for them by calling them beloved, hereby evidencing that he added to godliness brotherly kindness, as he had, ch. i. 7, exhorted them to do. Ministers must be examples of love and affection, as well as life and conversation.

Secondly, He evidences a sincere love to them, and hearty concern for them, by writing the same thing to them, though in other words. It being safe for them, it shall not be grievous to him to write upon the same subject, and pursue the same design by those methods which are most likely to succeed.

Thirdly, The better to recommend the matter, he tells them that what he would have them to remember are, 1. "The words spoken by the holy prophets," who were Divinely inspired, both enlightened and sanctified by the Holy Ghost; and seeing these persons' minds were purified by the sanctifying operation of the same Spirit, they were the better disposed to receive and retain what came from God by the holy prophets. 2. "The commandments of the apostles of the Lord and Saviour," and therefore the disciples and servants of Christ ought to regard what those, who are sent by him, have declared unto them to be the will of their Lord. What God has spoken by the prophets of the Old Testament, and Christ has commanded by the apostles of the New, cannot but demand and deserve to be frequently remembered; and they who meditate on these things will feel the quickening virtue thereof. It is by these things the pure minds of Christians are to be stirred up, that they may be active and lively in the work of holiness, and zealous and unwearied in the way to heaven.

3 Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, 4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. 5 For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: 6 Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: 7 But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

To quicken and excite us to a serious minding and firm adhering to what God has revealed to us by the prophets and apostles, we are told that there will be scoffers, men who will both make a mock of sin and of salvation from it. God's way of saving sinners by Jesus Christ is what men will scoff at, and that in the last days under the Gospel. This indeed may seem very strange, that the New Testament dispensation of the covenant of grace, which is spiritual, and therefore more agreeable to the nature of God than the Old, should be ridiculed and reproached; but the spirituality and simplicity of the New Testament worship is directly contrary to the carnal mind of man. And this accounts for what the apostle seems here to hint at, namely, that scoffers shall be more numerous and more bold in the last days than ever before. Though, in all ages, those who were born and walked after the flesh did persecute, revile, and reproach them who were born and did walk after the Spirit; yet in the last days there will be a great improvement in the art and impudence of bantering serious godliness, and those who firmly adhere to that circumspection and self-denial which the Gospel prescribes. This is what is mentioned as a thing well known to all Christians, and therefore they ought to reckon upon it, that they may not be surprised and shaken, as if some strange thing happened unto them. Now, to prevent the true Christian's being overcome, when attacked by these scoffers, we are told,

First, What sort of persons they are. They "walk after their own lusts;" they follow the devices and desires of their own hearts, and carnal corrupt affections, and not the dictates and directions of right reason and an enlightened, well-informed judgment. This they do in the course of their conversation,—they live as they list, and they speak as they list; it is not only their inward minds that are evil, and opposite to God, as the mind of every unrenewed sinner is, (Rom. viii. 7), alienated from God, ignorant of him, and averse to him; but they are grown to such a height of wickedness that they proclaim openly what is in the hearts of others who are yet carnal; they say their tongues are their own, and their strength, and time, and all is their own, and who is Lord over them? Who shall contradict or control them, or ever call them to account for what they say or do? And as they scorn to be confined by any laws of God in their conversation, so neither will they bear that the revelation of God should dictate and prescribe to them what they are to believe. As they will walk in their own way, and talk their own language, so will they also think their own thoughts, and form principles which are altogether their own. Here also their own lusts alone shall be consulted by them. None but such accomplished libertines as are here described can take a seat, at least they cannot sit in the seat of the scornful. By this ye shall know them, that ye may the better be upon your guard against them.

Secondly, We also are foretold how far they will proceed. They will attempt to shake and unsettle us, even as to our belief of Christ's second coming. They will scoffingly say, "Where is the promise of his coming?" ver. 4. Without this all the other articles of the Christian faith will signify very little. This is that which fills up and gives the finishing stroke to all the rest. The promised Messiah is come; he was made flesh, and dwelt among us; he is altogether such a one as is stated before, and has done all that for us which has been before taken notice of. These principles the enemies of Christianity have all along endeavoured to overturn; but as these do all rest upon facts which are already past, and of which this and the other apostles have given us the most sure and satisfying evidence, it is probable they will at last grow weary of their opposition to them. And yet, while one very principal article of our faith does refer to what is still behind, and only has a promise to rest upon, here they will still attack us, even to the end of time. Till our Lord is come, they will not themselves believe that he will come; nay, they will laugh at the very mention of his second coming, and do what in them lies to put all out of countenance who do seriously believe and wait for it. Now, therefore, let us see how this point stands, both on the believer's part, and on the part of these seducers. The believer does not only desire that he may come, but, having a promise that he will come, a promise that he himself has made and oft repeated,—a promise received and reported by faithful witnesses, and left upon sure record,—he is also firmly and fully persuaded that he will come. On the other hand, these seducers, because they wish he never may, therefore do all that in them lies to cheat themselves and others into a persuasion that he never will come. If they cannot deny that there is a promise, yet they will laugh at that very promise, which argues much higher degrees of infidelity and contempt. "Where is the promise," say they, "of his coming?"

Thirdly, We are also forewarned of the method of their reasoning, for while they laugh, they will pretend to argue too. To this purpose they add, that "since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," ver. 4. This is a subtle, though not a solid, way of reasoning; it is apt to make impressions upon weak minds, and especially upon wicked hearts. Because sentence against them is not speedily executed, therefore they flatter themselves that it never will; whereupon "their hearts are fully set in them to do evil," Ecc. viii. 11. Thus they act themselves, and thus they would persuade others to act. So here, say they, the fathers are fallen asleep, they are all dead to whom the promise was made, and it never was made good in their time, and there is no likelihood that it ever will be in any time.

Why should we trouble ourselves about it? If there had been any truth or certainty in the promise you speak of, we should surely have seen somewhat of it before this time—some signs of his coming, some preparatory steps in order to it; whereas we find to this very day "all things continue as they were," without any change, even "from the beginning of the creation." Since the world has undergone no changes in the course of so many thousand years, why should we fright ourselves as if it were to have an end? Thus do these scoffers argue. "Because they see no changes, therefore they fear not God," Ps. lv. 19. They neither fear him nor his judgments; what he never has done, they would conclude he never can, or never will do.

Fourthly, Here is the falsehood of their argument detected: whereas they confidently had said there had not been any change from the beginning of the creation, the apostle puts us in remembrance of a change already past, which, in a manner, does equal that which we are called to expect and look for, which was the drowning of the world in the days of Noah. This these scoffers had overlooked, they took no notice of it; though they might have known it, and ought to have known it, yet "this they willingly are ignorant of," ver. 5. They choose to pass it over in silence, as if they had never heard or known any thing of it. If they knew it, they did not like to retain it in their knowledge; they did not receive this truth in the love of it, neither did they care to own it. Note, It is hard to persuade men to believe what they are not willing to find true; they are ignorant in many cases, because they are willing to be ignorant; and they do not know, because they do not care to know. But let not sinners think that such ignorance as this will be admitted as an excuse for whatever sin it may betray them into. They who crucified Christ did not know who he was, for "had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory," 1 Cor. ii. 8. But though ignorant, they were not therefore innocent; their ignorance itself was a sin, willing and wilful ignorance, and one sin can be no excuse for another. So it is here, had these known of the dreadful vengeance with which God swept away a whole world of ungodly wretches at once, they would not surely have scoffed at his threatenings of any after, equally terrible, judgment. But here they were willingly ignorant; they did not know what God had done, because they had no mind to know it. Now, therefore, we shall proceed to consider the representation which the apostle here lays down, both of the destruction of the old world by water, and that which does await this present world at the final conflagration. He mentions the one as what God has done, to convince and persuade us the rather to believe that the other both may be and will be. And,

1. We begin with the apostle's account of the destruction which has once already come upon the world, ver. 5, 6: "By the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water, whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished." Originally the world was otherwise situated. The waters were most wisely divided at the creation, and most beneficially for us; some of the waters had proper repositories above the firmament, here called the heavens, (as it is also Gen. i. 8); and others under the firmament, gathered together unto one place: there were then both sea and dry land, a commodious habitation for the children of men. But now at the time of the universal deluge the case is strangely altered; the waters which God had divided before, and assigned to each part its convenient receptacle, now does he in anger throw together again in a heap; "He breaks up the fountains of the great deep, and throws open the windows," that is, the clouds, "of heaven," Gen. vii. 11, till the whole earth was overflowed with water, and not a spot upon the highest mountains but what was fifteen cubits under water, Gen. vii. 20. Thus did he make known at once his terrible power and his fierce anger, and made an end of a whole world at once. "The world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished," ver. 6. Is not here a change, and a most awful change! And then it is to be observed, that all this was done "by the word of God." It was by his powerful word that the world was made at first, and made in so commodious and beautiful a frame and order Heb. xi. 3, καταρτίσθαι. "He said, Let there be a firmament," &c. Gen. i. 6, 7; and, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place," &c., ver. 9, 10. Thus "He spake, and it was done," Ps. xxxiii. 9. Thus, says our apostle, "by the word of the Lord the heavens were" as they were "of old," that is, at the first creation; "and the earth" (as it was at first, a terraqueous globe) "standing out of the water and in the water." Nor was it only the first frame and order of the world that is here said to be "by the word of God," but the after confusion and ruin of the world, as well as the utter destruction of its inhabitants, was also "by the same word." None but that God who stretched out the heavens, and laid the foundation of the earth, could destroy and overthrow such a vast fabric at once. This was done by the word of his power, and it was also done according to the word of his promise. God had said that he would destroy man, even all flesh, and that he would do it by bringing a flood of waters upon the earth, Gen. vi. 7, 13, 17. This was the change which God had before brought upon the world, and which these scoffers had overlooked. And now we are to consider,

2. What the apostle says of the destructive change which is yet to come upon it. [They who maintained that the prediction that the earth would be destroyed was improbable, affirmed that there were no signs of such an event; that the laws of nature were stable and uniform; and that, as those laws had been so long and so uniformly unbroken, it was absurd to believe that such an event could occur. To meet this, all that was necessary was to shew that, in a case where the same objections substantially might be urged, it had actually occurred that the world had been destroyed. There was, in itself considered, as much improbability in believing that the world could be destroyed by water as that it would be destroyed by fire, and consequently the objection had no real force. Notwithstanding the apparent stability of the laws of nature, the world had been once destroyed; and there is, therefore, no improbability that it may be again.]

ii. 3. "In," not "through;" the element in which these false teachers live is covetousness (verse 15). Instances of God's punishment of the ungodly follow:—

ii. 4. The rebellious angels.

ii. 5. The people before the Flood.

ii. 6. Sodom and Gomorrah.

ii. 10. "Dignities;" literally, "glories" "Them that are in authority" (Tyndal). "Them that excel in worship" (Cranmer).

ii. 11. Angels do not act thus. "Fools rush in where angels fear to tread" (Pope).

ii. 12. "But these as irrational animals, born naturally for capture and destruction, speaking of the things they understand not, shall even perish in their corruption, receiving the reward of unrighteousness" (Alford). The stop should apparently be at "unrighteousness," as in Tyndal, Cranmer, and Alford; a fresh sentence then commencing.

"The heavens and the earth which now are, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fires against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men," ver. 7; where we have an awful account of the final dissolution of the world, and which we are yet more nearly concerned in. The ruin that came upon the world and its inhabitants by the flood we read, and hear, and think of with concern, though those who were swept away by it were such as we never knew; but the judgment here spoken of is yet to come, and will surely come, though we know not when, nor upon what particular age or generation of men; and therefore we are not, we cannot be, sure that it may not happen in our own times; and this makes a very great difference, though it should be admitted that they were equal in every other respect, which yet must not be allowed, for there were some, though very few, who escaped that deluge, but not one can escape in this conflagration: besides that, we were not in reach of the one, but are not sure that we shall not be included in the other calamity. Now, therefore, to see the world to which we belong destroyed at once; not a single person only, not a particular family only, nor yet a nation, (even that which we are most nearly interested in and concerned for,) but the whole world, I say, sinking at once, and no ark provided, no possible way left of escaping for any one from the common ruin; this makes a difference between the desolation that has been, and what we yet are to expect. The one is already past, and never to return upon us any more; for God has said expressly that there shall "never any more be a flood to destroy the earth," Gen. ix. 11-17. The other is still behind, and as certain to come as the truth and the power of God can make it. The one came gradually upon the world, and was growing upon its inhabitants forty days, before it made an utter end of them, Gen. vii. 12, 17. This other will come upon them swiftly, and all at once, 2 Pet. ii. 1. Besides that, there were in that overthrow, as we have said, a few who did escape, but the ruin which does yet await this world, whenever it comes, will be absolutely a universal one; not any part but what the devouring flames will seize upon; not a sanctuary left any where for the inhabitants to flee to; not a single spot in all this world where any one of them can be safe. Thus, whatever differences may be assigned between that destruction of the world and this here spoken of, they do indeed represent the approaching as the most terrible judgment; yet that the world has once been destroyed by an universal deluge does render it the more credible that it may again be ruined by an universal conflagration. Let, therefore, the scoffers, who laugh at the coming of our Lord to judgment at last, consider that it may be. There is nothing said of it in the word of God but what is within reach of the power of God; and, though they still should laugh, they shall not put us out of countenance; we are well assured that it will be, because he has said it, and we can depend upon his promise. They do err, not knowing (at least, not believing) the Scriptures, nor the power of God; but we know, and we do or ought to depend upon, both. Now that which he has said, and which he will certainly make good, is, that "the heavens and the earth which now are," which we are now related to, and which still subsist in all the beauty and order in which we see them, and which are so agreeable and useful to us, as we find they are; they are kept in store, not to be what earthly minds would wish to have them, treasures for us, but to be what God will have them, in his treasury, securely lodged and kept safe for his purposes; it follows, they are "reserved unto fire." Observe, God's following judgments are more terrible than those which went before. The old world was destroyed by water, but this is reserved unto fire, which shall burn up the wicked at the last day; and though this seems to be delayed, yet, as this wicked world is upheld by the word of God, so it is only reserved for the vengeance of Him to whom vengeance belongs, who will at the day of judgment deal with an ungodly world according to their deserts: for "the day of judgment" is the day of the "perdition of ungodly men." They who now scoff at a future judgment shall find it a day of vengeance and utter destruction. Beware, therefore, of being among those scoffers. Never question but the day of the Lord will come. Give diligence, therefore, to be found in Christ, that it may be a time of refreshment and day of redemption to you, which will be a day of indignation and wrath to the ungodly world.

8 But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 9 The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is longsuffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. 10 But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up.

The apostle comes in these words to instruct and establish Christians in the truth of the coming of the Lord, where we may clearly discern the tenderness and affection wherewith he speaks to them, calling them "beloved." He had a compassionate concern and a love of goodwill for the ungodly wretches who refused to believe Divine revelation; but he has a peculiar respect for the true believers, and the remaining ignorance and weakness that he apprehends to be in them make him jealous, and put him on giving them a caution. And here we may observe,

First. The truth which the apostle asserts, that "with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." Though in the account of men there is a great deal of difference between a day and a year, and a vast deal more between one day and a thousand years, yet in the account of God, who inhabits eternity, in which there is no succession, there is no difference; for all things past, present, and future, are ever before him, and the delay of a thousand years cannot be so much to him as the deferring any thing for a day or hour is to us.

Secondly. The importance of this truth. This is the one thing the apostle would not have us ignorant of. A holy awe and reverential fear of God is necessary in order to our worshipping and glorifying him, and a belief of the inconceivable distance between him and us is very proper to beget and maintain that religious fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom. This is a truth that belongs to our peace, and therefore he endeavours it may not be hid from our eyes, as it is in the original, "Let not this one thing be hid from you." If men have no knowledge or belief of the eternal God, they will be very apt to think him such an one as themselves. And yet how hard is it to conceive of eternity. It is, therefore, not very easy to attain such knowledge of God as is absolutely necessary.

Thirdly. In the 9th verse we are told the Lord is not slack; he does not delay beyond the appointed time. As God kept the time that he had appointed for the delivering Israel out of Egypt to a day, Ex. xii. 41, so he will keep to the time appointed in coming to judge the world. What a difference is there between the account which God makes and that which men make! Good men are apt to think God stays beyond the appointed time, that is, the time which they have set for their own and the church's deliverance; but they set one time, and God sets another, and he will not fail to keep the day which he has appointed; and ungodly men, they dare charge a culpable slackness upon God, as if he had slipped the time, and laid aside the thoughts of coming. But the apostle assures us that what men count slackness is truly long-suffering, and that to us-ward it is a giving more time to his own people, whom he has chosen, before the foundation of the world, many of whom are not as yet converted; and those who are in a state of grace and favour with God are to advance in knowledge and holiness, and in the exercise of faith and patience, to abound in good works, doing and suffering what they are called to, that they may bring glory to God, and improve in a meetness for heaven; for God is "not willing that any" of these "should perish, but that all of them should come to repentance." Here observe, 1. Repentance is absolutely necessary in order to salvation; "except we repent we shall perish," Luk. xiii. 3, 5. 2. God has no delight in the death of sinners. As the punishment of sinners is a torment unto his creatures, a merciful God does not take pleasure in it; and though the principal design of God in his long-suffering is the blessedness of them "whom he has chosen to salvation, through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth," yet his goodness and forbearance do in their own nature invite and call to repentance all those to whom they are exercised. And if men continue impenitent, when God gives them space to repent, he will deal more severely with them, though the great reason why he did not hasten his coming was because he had not accomplished the number of his elect. Abuse not, therefore, the patience and long-suffering of God, by abandoning yourselves to a course of ungodliness. Presume not to go on boldly in the way of sinners, nor to sit down securely in an unconverted, impenitent state, as he that said, Mat. xxiv. 48, "My Lord delayeth his coming, lest he come and surprise you;" for as we read, ver. 10, "the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night." Where we may observe,

1st. The certainty of the day of the Lord. Though it is now above sixteen hundred years since this epistle was written, and the day is not yet come, it assuredly will come. "God has appointed a day wherein he will judge the world in righteousness," and he will keep his appointment. "It is appointed to men once to die, and after this judgment," Heb. ix. 27. Settle it, therefore, in your hearts that the day of the Lord will certainly come, and you shall certainly be called to give an account of all things done in the body, whether good or evil; and let your exact walking before God, and your frequent judging yourselves, evidence your firm belief of a future judgment, when many live as if they were never to give any account at all.

2nd. The suddenness of this day. It will come "as a thief in the night," at a time when men are sleeping and secure, and have no manner of apprehension or expectation of the day of the Lord, no more than men have of a thief when they are in a deep sleep in the dark and silent night. "At midnight there was a cry, Behold the bridegroom comes," Mat. xxv. 6; and at that time not only the foolish, but also the wise virgins slumbered and slept. The Lord will come in a day when we look not for him, and an hour when men are not aware. That time which men think to be the most improper and unlikely, and therefore are most secure, will be the time of the Lord's coming. Let us, then, beware how we in our thoughts and imaginations put that day far away from us, but rather suppose it to be so much nearer in reality by how much farther off it is in the opinion of the ungodly world.

3rd. The solemnity of this coming. 1st. "The heavens shall pass away with a great noise." The visible heavens, as unable to abide, when the Lord shall come in his glory, shall pass away, they shall undergo a mighty alteration; and this shall be very sudden, and with such a noise as the breaking and tumbling down of so great a fabric must necessarily occasion. 2nd. "The elements shall melt with fervent heat." At this coming of the Lord it shall not only be very tempestuous round about him, so that the very heavens shall pass away as in a mighty, violent storm, but "a fire shall go before him," that shall melt the elements of which the creatures are composed. 3rd. "The earth also, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up." The earth and its inhabitants, and all the works, whether of nature or art, shall be destroyed. The stately palaces and gardens, and all the desirable things wherein worldly-minded men did seek and place their happiness, all of them shall be burnt up. All sorts of creatures which God has made, and all the works of men, must submit; all must pass through the fire, which shall be a consuming fire to all that sin has brought into the world, though it may be but a refining fire to the works of God's hand, that, the glass of the creation being made much brighter, the saints may much better discern the glory of the Lord therein.

[As to the possibility or probability of such a destruction by fire as is here predicted, no one can have any doubt who is acquainted with the disclosures of modern science in regard to the internal structure of the earth. Even the ancient philosophers, from some cause, supposed that the earth would yet be destroyed by fire; and modern science has made it probable that the interior of the earth is a melted and intensely heated mass of burning materials; that the habitable world is but a comparatively thin crust or shell over those internal fires; that earthquakes are caused by the vapours engendered by that heated mass when water comes in contact with it; and that volcanoes are but vent-holes through which those internal flames make their way to the surface. Whether these fires will everywhere make their way to the surface, and produce a universal conflagration, perhaps could not be determined by science; but no one can doubt that the simple command of God would be all that is necessary to pour those burning floods over the earth, as he once caused the waters to roll over every mountain and through every valley. As to the question whether it is probable that such a change produced by fire, and bringing the present order of things to a close, will occur, it may be remarked farther that there is reason to believe that such changes are in fact taking place in other worlds. "During the last two or three centuries, upwards of thirteen fixed stars have disappeared. One of them, situated in the northern hemisphere, presented a peculiar brilliancy, and was so bright as to be seen by the naked eye at mid-day. It seemed to be on fire, appearing at first of a dazzling white, then of a reddish yellow, and lastly of an ashy pale colour. La Place supposes that it was burned up, as it has never been seen since. The conflagration was visible about sixteen months.]"

And now, who can but observe what a difference there will be between the first coming of Christ and the second! And yet that is called "the great and dreadful day of the Lord" Mal. iv. 5. How much more dreadful must this coming to judgment be! May we be so wise as to prepare for it, that it may not be a day of vengeance and destruction unto us. Oh, what will become of us if we set our affections on this earth, and make it our portion, seeing all

ii. 13. "Counting as pleasure that delicate living which is but for a day" (Alford). "They count it pleasure to live deliciously for a season" (Tyndal). The Authorised Version, "riot," is a mistranslation. "Spots, &c. in your feasts of charity," or "love-feasts:" see Jude 12.

ii. 14. "A heart practised in covetousness, children of the curse:" so literally.

ii. 15. Their covetousness leads to their being cursed.

ii. 17. "Mists driven by a whirlwind:" so best MSS.

ii. 18. Most MSS. read "those who had nearly escaped." Those who were nearly free from the errors in doctrine and practice of the heathen are laid hold of by these deceivers, who (verse 19) promise them Gospel freedom while they themselves are still in bondage to corruption, and know nothing of true liberty. (Compare the whole passage, verses 1-18, with Jude 4-13.)

ii. 20. Sin against knowledge is more fatal than ignorant sin.

11 Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, 12 Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? 13 Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. 14 Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless. 15 And account that the longsuffering of our Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also according to the wisdom given unto him hath written unto you; 16 As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things; in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction. 17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. 18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

First. The apostle having instructed them in the doctrine of Christ's second coming, he takes occasion thence to exhort them to purity and godliness in their whole conversation. All the truths which are revealed in Scripture should be improved for our advancement in practical godliness. "This is the effect that knowledge must produce, or we are never the better for it; 'If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them.' Seeing all these things must be dissolved, how holy should we be that are assured of it, departing from and dying to sin, that has so corrupted and defiled all the visible creation that there is an absolute need of its dissolution! All that was made for man's use is subject to vanity by man's sin; and if the sin of man has brought the visible heavens, and the elements, and earth, under a curse, from which they cannot be freed without being dissolved, what an abominable evil is sin, and how much to be hated by us! And inasmuch as this dissolution is in order to their being restored to their primitive beauty and excellency, how pure and holy should we be, in order to our being fit for the new heaven and new earth, wherein dwells righteousness! It is a very exact and universal holiness that he exhorts to, not resting in any lower measure or degree, but labouring to be eminent beyond what is commonly attained. Holy in God's house and in our own, holy in our worshipping of God, and in our conversing with men, all our conversations, whether with high or low, rich or poor, good or bad, friends or enemies, must be holy. We must keep ourselves 'unspotted from the world' in all our converse with it; we must be 'perfecting holiness in the fear of God,' and in the love of God too. We must exercise ourselves unto godliness of all sorts in all its parts, trusting in God, and delighting in God only, who continues the same when the whole visible creation shall be dissolved; devoting ourselves to the service of God, and designing the glorifying and enjoyment of God, who endures for ever; whereas, what worldly men delight in and follow after must all be dissolved. These things, which we now see, must in a little while pass away, and be no more as they now are. Look, therefore, at what shall abide and continue, which, though it is not present, is certain, and not far off. This looking for the day of God is one of the directions the apostle gives us in order to our being eminently holy and godly in all manner of conversation. Look for the day of God as what you firmly believe shall come, and what you earnestly long for. The coming of the day of God is what every Christian must hope for and earnestly expect; for it is a day when Christ shall appear in the glory of the Father, and evidence his Divinity and Godhead, even to those who counted him a mere man. The first coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, when he appeared in the form of a servant, was what the people of God did earnestly wait and look for; that coming was for 'the consolation of Israel,' Lu. ii. 25. How much more should they wait with expectation and earnestness for his second coming, which will be the day of their complete redemption, and of his most glorious manifestation. Then he shall come to be admired in his saints, and glorified in all them that believe; for though it cannot but terrify and affright the ungodly to see the visible heavens all in a flame, and the elements melting, yet the believer, whose faith is the evidence of things not seen, can rejoice in hope of more glorious heavens, after these have been melted and refined by that dreadful fire which shall burn up all the dross of this visible creation. Here we must take notice, i. What true Christians look for, and that is, "new heavens and a new earth," in which a great deal more of the wisdom, power, and goodness of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ will be clearly discerned than we are able to discover in what we now see. For in these new heavens and earth, freed from the vanity the former were subject to, and the sin they were polluted with, only righteousness shall dwell; this is to be the habitation of such righteous persons who do righteousness, and are free from the power and pollution of sin. All the wicked shall be turned into hell. Those only who are clothed with the righteousness of Christ, and sanctified by the Holy Ghost, shall be admitted to dwell in this holy place.

2. What is the ground and foundation of this expectation and hope; it is the promise of God. To look for any thing which God has not promised is presumption; but if our expectations are according to the promise, both as to the things we look for, and the time and way of their being brought about, we cannot meet with a disappointment; for he is faithful who has promised. See, therefore, that you raise and regulate your expectations of all the great things that are to come according to the word of God; and, as to the new heaven and new earth, look for them, as God has allowed and directed by the passages we have in this portion of Scripture now before you, and in Isa. lvi. 17; lvi. 22, to which the apostle may be thought to allude.

Secondly. As in the 11th verse he exhorts to holiness, from the consideration that the heavens and earth shall be dissolved, so in ver. 14 he resumes his exhortation, from the consideration that they shall be again renewed. Seeing you expect the day of God, when our Lord Jesus Christ will appear in his glorious majesty, and these heavens and earth shall be dissolved and melted down, and, being purified and refined, shall be erected and rebuilt, prepare to meet him. It nearly concerns us to see in what state we are when the Judge of all the world comes to pass sentence upon men, and to determine how it shall be with them to all eternity. This is the court of judicature whence there lies no appeal. Whatever sentence is here passed by this great Judge is irreversible; therefore get ready to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. And see to it,

1. "That you are found of him in peace;" in a state of peace and reconciliation with God through Christ, in whom alone God is reconciling the world to himself; and all that are out of Christ are in a state of enmity, and reject and oppose the Lord and his Anointed, and shall therefore "be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power." They whose sins are pardoned, and their peace made with God, are the only safe and happy people; therefore follow after peace, and that with all. 1st. Peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. 2nd. Peace in our own consciences, through the Spirit of grace, witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God. 3rd. Peace with men, by having a calm and peaceable disposition wrought in us, resembling that of our blessed Lord.

2. That ye be found of Christ "without spot, and blameless." Follow after holiness as well as peace, and even spotless and perfect; not only take heed of all spots which are not the spots of God's children, this only prevents our being found of men without spot,—but we must be found of Christ without spot; we must be pressing towards spotless purity, absolute perfection. Christians must be perfecting holiness, that they may be not only blameless before men, but also in the sight of God. And all this deserves and needs the greatest diligence. He that does this work negligently can never do it successfully. Never expect to be found at that day of God in peace, if you are lazy and idle in this your day, in which we must finish the work that is given us to do. It is only the diligent Christian that will be the happy Christian in the day of the Lord. Our Lord will suddenly come to us, or shortly call us to him, and would you have him find you idle? Remember, there is a curse denounced against him who does the work of the Lord negligently, Jer. xlviii. 10. Heaven will be a sufficient recompence for all our diligence and industry; therefore let us labour and take pains in the work of the Lord. He will certainly reward us if we be diligent in the work he has allotted us.

Now that you may be diligent, "account the long-suffering of our Lord to be salvation." Does your Lord delay his coming? Do not think this is to give more time to make provision for your lusts, to gratify them; it is so much space to repent and work out your salvation. It proceeds not from a want of concern or compassion for his suffering servants, nor is it designed to give countenance and encouragement to the world of the ungodly, but that men may have time to prepare for eternity. Learn, then, to make a right use of the patience of our Lord, who does as yet delay his coming. Follow after peace and holiness, or else his coming will be dreadful unto you. And inasmuch as it is difficult to prevent men's abuse of God's patience, and engage them in the right improvement thereof, our apostle quotes St. Paul as directing men to make the same good use of the Divine forbearance, that in the mouth, or from the pen, of two apostles the truth might be confirmed. And we may here observe with what esteem and affection he speaks of him, who had formerly publicly withstood and sharply reproved St. Peter. If a righteous man smite one that is truly religious, it shall be received as a kindness; and let him reprove, it shall be an excellent oil, which shall soften and sweeten the good man that is reproved when he does amiss. What an honourable mention does this apostle of the circumcision make of that very man who had openly, before all, reproved him, as not walking uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel! 1st. He calls him brother; whereby he means not only that he is a fellow-Christian, in which sense the word brethren is used, 1 Thes. v. 27, or a fellow-preacher, in which sense St. Paul calls Timothy the evangelist a brother, Col. i. 1, but a fellow apostle, one who had the same extraordinary commission, immediately from Christ himself, to preach the Gospel in every place, and to disciple all nations. Though many seducing teachers denied Paul's apostleship, yet St. Peter owns him to be an apostle. 2nd. He calls him beloved, and they, being both alike commissioned, and both united in the same service of the same Lord, it would have been very unseemly if they had not been united in affection to one another, for the strengthening one another's hands, mutually desirous of, and rejoicing in, one another's success. 3rd. He mentions St. Paul as one who had an uncommon measure of wisdom given unto him. He was a person of eminent knowledge in the mysteries of the Gospel, and did neither in that or any other qualification come behind any of all the other apostles. How desirable is it that those who preach the same Gospel would treat one another according to the pattern St. Peter here sets them! It is surely their duty to endeavour, by proper methods, to prevent or remove all prejudices that hinder ministers' usefulness, and to beget and improve that esteem and respect in the minds of people toward their ministers as may promote the success of their labours. And let us also here observe, First. The excellent wisdom that was in St. Paul is said to be given him. That understanding and knowledge that qualifies men to preach the Gospel is the gift of God. We must seek for knowledge and labour to get understanding, in hopes that it shall be given us from above, while we are diligent in using proper means to attain it. Secondly. The apostle imparts to men according as he had received from God. He endeavours to lead others as far as he himself was let into the knowledge of the mysteries of the Gospel. He is not an intruder into those things he had not seen or been fully assured of, and yet he does not fail to declare the whole counsel of God, Acts xx. 27. Thirdly. The epistles, which were written by the apostle of the Gentiles, and directed to those Gentiles who believed in Christ, are designed for the instruction and edification of those who, from among the Jews, were brought to believe in Christ; for it is generally thought what is here alluded to is contained in the epistle to the Romans, ch. ii. 4, though in all his epistles there are some things that refer to one or other of the subjects treated of in this and the foregoing chapter; and it cannot seem strange that those who were pursuing the same general design should in their epistles insist upon the same things. But the apostle Peter proceeds to tell us that in those things which are to be met with in St. Paul's epistles there are some things hard to be understood. Among the variety of subjects treated of in

ii. 22. These men knew the truth, but it had not affected their hearts and lives, so they fell away and returned to sinful practices and teaching.

iii. The certainty of Christ's coming, in spite of the scoffs of the unbelieving. God's long-suffering gives time for repentance. Exhortation to grow in the knowledge of Christ.

iii. 1. "Pure minds:" the word translated "pure" may mean transparent, "clear," or "purged," and hence "sincere."

iii. 2. The best MSS. read "of your apostles" in place of, as Authorised Version, "of us the apostles." "The words spoken before by the holy prophets, and the commandment of the Lord and Saviour given by your apostles" (Alford). "The apostles who live amongst you in the present times, in contrast to the Old Testament prophets" (Fausset).

iii. 3. Best MSS. read "scoffers in scoffing"—i.e., revelling in scoffing.

Scripture, some are not easy to be understood, because of their own obscurity, such as prophecies; others cannot be so easily understood, because of their excellency and sublimity, as the mysterious doctrines; and others are with difficulty taken in, because of the weakness of men's minds, such are the things of the Spirit of God, mentioned 1 Cor. ii. 14. And here the unlearned and unstable make wretched work; for they wrest and torture the Scriptures to make them speak what the Holy Ghost did not intend. Those who are not well instructed and well established in the truth are in great danger of perverting the word of God. They who have heard and learned of the Father are best secured from misunderstanding and misapplying any part of the word of God; and where there is a Divine power to establish as well as to instruct men in Divine truth, persons are effectually secured from falling into errors. And how great a blessing this is, we learn by observing what is the pernicious consequence of the errors that ignorant and unstable men fall into, even their own destruction. Errors in particular concerning the holiness and justice of God are the utter ruin of multitudes of men. Let us, therefore, earnestly pray for the Spirit of God to instruct us in the truth, that we may know it as it is in Jesus, and have our hearts established with grace, that we may stand firm and unshaken, even in most stormy times, when others are tossed to and fro with every wind of doctrine.

[He refers not to the difficulty of understanding what Paul meant, but to the difficulty of comprehending the great truths which he taught. This is, generally, the greatest difficulty in regard to the statements of Paul. The difficulty is not that the meaning of the writer is not plain, but it is either, 1. That the mind is overpowered by the grandeur of the thought, and the incomprehensible nature of the theme; or, 2. That the truth is so unpalatable, and the mind is so prejudiced against it, that we are unwilling to receive it. Many a man knows well enough what Paul means, and would receive his doctrines without hesitation, if the heart was not opposed to it; and in this state of mind Paul is charged with obscurity, when the real difficulty lies only in the heart of him who makes the complaint. If this be the true interpretation of this passage, then it should not be adduced to prove that Paul is an obscure writer, whatever may be true on that point. There are, undoubtedly, obscure things in his writings, as there are in all other ancient compositions, but this passage should not be adduced to prove that he had not the faculty of making himself understood. An honest heart, a willingness to receive the truth, is one of the best qualifications for understanding the writings of Paul; and when this exists, no one will fail to find truth that may be comprehended, and that will be eminently adapted to sanctify and save the soul.—Barnes. It is incredible, says Bishop Horsley, to any one who has not made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner, without any other commentary or exposition than what the different parts of the sacred volume mutually furnish for each other. Let the most illiterate Christian study them in this manner, and let him never cease to pray for the illumination of that Spirit by which these books were dictated, and the whole compass of abstruse philosophy and recorded history shall furnish no argument with which the perverse will of

Thirdly. In ver. 17 the apostle gives them a word of caution, where he intimates that the knowledge we have of these things should make us very wary and watchful, inasmuch as there is a twofold danger:—

1. We are in great danger of being seduced and turned away from the truth. The unlearned and unstable, and they are very numerous, do generally wrest the Scripture. Many who have the Scriptures, and read them, do not understand what they read; and too many of those who have a right understanding of the sense and meaning of the word are not established in the belief of the truth, and all these are liable to fall into error. Few attain to the knowledge and acknowledgment of doctrinal Christianity; and fewer find, so as to keep in the way of practical godliness, which is the narrow way which only leadeth unto life. There must be a great deal of self-denial and suspicion of ourselves, and submitting to the authority of Christ Jesus our great prophet, before we can heartily receive all the truths of the Gospel, and therefore we are in great danger of rejecting the truth.

2. We are in great danger by being seduced. For, 1st. So far as we are turned from the truth, so far are we turned out of the way to true blessedness into the path which leads to destruction. If men corrupt the word of God it tends to their own utter ruin. 2nd. When men wrest the word of God, they fall into "the error of the wicked," men without law, that keep to no rules, set no bounds to themselves, a sort of free-thinkers, which the psalmist does detest; Ps. cxix. 113, "I hate vain thoughts, but thy law do I love." Whatever opinions and thoughts of men are not conformable to the law of God, and warranted by it, the good man does disclaim and abhor; they are the conceits and counsels of the ungodly, who have forsaken God's law; and if we imbibed their opinions we shall too soon imitate their practices. 3rd. They who are led away by error "fall from their own steadfastness." They are wholly unhinged and unsettled, and know not where to rest, but are at the greatest uncertainty, like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. It nearly concerns us, therefore, to be upon our guard, seeing the danger is so great. Now that we may the better avoid being led away, the apostle, ver. 18, directs us what to do. And we must "grow in grace." He had, in the beginning of the epistle, exhorted us to add one grace to another, and here he advises us to grow in all grace, in faith, and virtue, and knowledge. By how much the stronger grace is in us, by so much the more steadfast shall we be in the truth. We must grow in "the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ." Follow on to know the Lord. Labour to know him more clearly and more fully, to know more of Christ, and to know him to better purpose, so as to be more like him, and to love him better. This is the knowledge of Christ the apostle Paul did reach after, and desire to attain to, Phil. iii. 10. Such a knowledge of Christ as conforms us more to him, and endears him more to us, must needs be of great use to us to preserve us from falling off in times of general apostacy; and they who experience this effect of the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ will, upon receiving such grace from him, give thanks and praise to him, and join with our apostle in saying, "To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen."

WELL AT ENROGEL IN JERUSALEM.

iii. 4. "The length of the interval gives occasion for the scoff of the unbeliever, and exercises the patience of the saints" (Webster and Wilkinson). See Isa. v. 18, 19. His coming is here looked upon as equivalent to the end of the world.

iii. 5—7. The apostle argues that since the world has once been destroyed, the scoffers cannot assume that such an event is impossible in the future, and that their assertion, "All things," &c., is not true. "The earth that was in the water appeared up out of the water by the word of God" (Tyndal). See Gen. i. 9. "Whereby," or "by which," in the original plural, therefore referring to the waters (Gen. vii. 11). "Perished," not was annihilated, but lost its original appearance. As the original creation was changed by the flood, so the present will be by fire (Rev. xxi. 1).

iii. 8—10. Second reason why God's delay is not an argument against the fulfilment of his promise, since his thoughts are not as ours; he is above all human limits of time. "God's age-meter (if it is lawful so to call it) differs from man's hour-meter. His dial shows all the hours at once," &c. (Bengel).

iii. 11, 12. Not interrogatory, but exclamatory. "Hastening!" better than "hasting unto" of the Authorised Version. "They hasten it by perfecting, in repentance and holiness, the work of the Gospel, and thus diminishing the need of the long-suffering to which the delay of that day is owing" (De Wette).

iii. 13. "But," not "nevertheless," as Authorised Version. "As the flood was the baptism of the earth, eventuating in a renovated earth, partially delivered from the curse, so the baptism with fire shall purify the earth, so as to be the renovated abode of regenerated man, wholly freed from the curse" (Fausset).

iii. 14. Not "of him," but "in his sight."

iii. 15. "Paul . . . hath written unto you:" Alford thinks this refers to 1 Thess. iv. 13—v. 11.

iii. 16. "The other Scriptures:" St. Paul's epistles were therefore at this time recognised as Scripture.

iii. 18. "The grace and the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ:" grace of which Christ is giver, knowledge of which Christ is the object.

EXPOSITION OF THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF JOHN, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.*

[Little need be said respecting the authenticity of this epistle, or the evidence that it was written by the apostle John. There are, in general, two sources of evidence in regard to ancient writings: the external evidence, or that which may be derived from the testimony of other writers; and the evidence which may be derived from some marks of the authorship in the writing itself, which is called the internal evidence. Both of these are remarkably clear in regard to this epistle. 1. The external evidence. It is quoted or referred to by the early Christian writers as the undoubted production of the apostle John. It is referred to by Polycarp in the beginning of the second century; it is quoted by Papias, and also by Irenæus. Origen says, 'John, beside the gospel and Revelation, has left us an epistle of a few lines. Grant also a second and a third; for all do not allow these to be genuine.' See Lardner, vi. 275, and Lucke, Einlei. i. Dionysius of Alexandria admitted the genuineness of John's first epistle; so also did Cyprian. All the three epistles were received by Athanasius, by Cyril of Jerusalem, and by Epiphanius. Eusebius says, 'Beside his gospel, his first epistle is universally acknowledged by those of the present time and by the ancients; but the other two are contradicted.']

2. Though the continued tradition of the church attests that this epistle came from St. John the apostle, yet we may observe some other evidence that will confirm, or with some, perhaps, even outvie the certainty of that tradition. It should seem that the penman was one of the apostolical college, by the sensible, palpable assurance he had had of the truth of the Mediator's person in his human nature: "That which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life," ver. 1. He here takes notice of the evidence the Lord gave to Thomas of his resurrection, by calling him to feel the prints of the nails and of the spear,—which is recorded by John. And he must have been one of the disciples present when the Lord came, on the same day in which he arose from the dead, and shewed them his hands and his side, Jno. xx. 20. But, that we may be assured which apostle this was, there is scarce a critic or competent judge of diction, or style of argument and spirit, but will adjudge this epistle to the writer of that Gospel that bears the name of the apostle John. They [the gospel and the epistle] wonderfully agree. 1. In the titles and characters of the Redeemer—"the Word, the Life, the Light;" compare ch. i. 1, and ch. v. 7, with Jno. i. 1 and Rev. xix. 13. 2. In the commendation of God's love to us; ch. iii. 1, and ch. iv. 9, with Jno. iii. 16. 3. In speaking of our regeneration, or being born of God; ch. iii. 9, ch. iv. 7, and ch. v. 1, with Jno. iii. 5, 6. [They agree, farther, in strong statements on the subjects of the free gift and the present enjoyment of eternal life through and with Christ Jesus; the value of the inspired record or testimony concerning him; the solemn obligation, and the instant efficacy of faith in his name on the warrant of this Gospel-word; the necessary working of faith by love, love especially to our brother believers; and, yet again, its hard struggle with, but habitual victory over, "the world."] Lastly, (to add no more instances, which may be easily seen on comparing this epistle with that gospel,) in the allusion to, or application of, that passage in that gospel which relates, and which relates alone, to the issuing of water and blood out of the Redeemer's open side: "This is he that came by water and blood," ch. v. 6. Thus the epistle plainly appears to flow from the same pen as that gospel did. Now, I know not that the text or the intrinsic history of any of the Gospels gives us such assurance of its writer or penman as that ascribed to John plainly does. There, (viz., ch. xxi. 24,) the sacred historian thus notices himself: "This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things; and we know that his testimony is true." Now, who is this disciple but he concerning whom Peter asked, "What shall this man do?" and concerning whom the Lord answered, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" ver. 21, 22. And who, in ver. 20, is described by these three characters, 1st. That he is the disciple whom Jesus loved, the Lord's peculiar friend. 2nd. That he also leaned on his breast at supper. 3rd. That he said unto him, "Lord, who is he that betrayeth thee?" As sure, then, as it is that that disciple was John, so sure may the church be that that gospel and this epistle came from the beloved John. The epistle is styled general, as being not inscribed to any particular church: it is a circular letter, or visitation charge, sent to divers churches, (some say of Parthia,) in order to confirm them in their steadfast adherence to the Lord Christ, and to the sacred doctrine concerning his person and office, against various seducers; and to instigate them to adorn that doctrine by love to God and man, and particularly to each other, as being descended from God, united by the same Head, and travelling towards the same eternal life.

[One practical observation, characteristic of this whole epistle, may usefully accompany us throughout the ensuing exposition of its profound, yet familiar, teachings. John was as eminently the apostle of truth as of charity. Full of "gracious words" for the "dear children" of his charge, his epistles are yet marked by much of controversial allusions, and by a severe fidelity in dealing with antichristian error. As one has well remarked, he 'doth not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing, but, to strengthen his affirmation, he denies its contrary. In like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. His writings, almost more than those of any other apostle, teem with the peculiarities of the gospel-theology; and in the statement of them he is precise, dogmatic, and uncompromising. Moreover, the very "love" of which he says so much, as a matter both of Christian law and of regenerate instinct, is none other than the mutual love of true believers, springing from a common love of the faith, and of its great Author and Finisher. Little, if anything, is here expressed on the subject of a general philanthropy; and still less as to the tenderness and forbearance due to those who deny, or have erred from, essential truth; although, doubtless, the same spiritual motives and principles which impel to brotherly love will move Christian hearts, after the pattern of Christ's own, to pity and care for those that are ignorant and out of the way. It is a wild mistake of men of latitudinarian sentiments to allege the authority of parts of this epistle for setting charity among men either against or above the truth of God. Nay, it is strange to find some that are really familiar with this epistle, and both submissive and attached to its theological teachings, placing charity in the order of operation, before subjective truth. St. John represents them as inseparable; and, farther, without any prejudice to the just hope that a greater union of heart and action among Christians will pave the way for a more harmonious judgment on some subordinate and still disputed points, he establishes, with all the authority of inspiration, the necessary antecedence of a catholic faith to a truly catholic love. He shews that the spiritual, God-regarding, and God-resembling, love, on which, after his Master's manner, he lays unceasing stress, is such as none, but "the brethren," begotten of God through the truth, and mutually known by its heavenly impress on the character of each, can either exercise, receive, or reciprocate. As he explains in the salutation of his second epistle, it is "love in the truth"—love between them "that have known the truth"—love "for the truth's sake, which," experimentally and practically, "dwelleth in us, and," doctrinally also, "shall be with us for ever." Observe, likewise, how pointedly we are taught in ch. v. 1, 2, of this first epistle, that the only proper object of that elevated and unworldly affection is he "whoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ," the anointed and alone Saviour so peculiarly set forth throughout the epistle, and who is thereby "born of God;" and that the only possible subject of it is the man who, to express the same change by other characters and effects, "loveth God, and keepeth his commandments."]

Introductory Note.—The authorship of this First Epistle is ascribed to the apostle and evangelist St. John by the almost unanimous voice of antiquity; Polycarp, Papias, Irenæus, and Tertullian refer to it. This, with the Second and Third Epistles, were most probably written by St. John during his residence at Ephesus, where he spent his latter years after his release from Patmos. It appears to have been written after his gospel, and to have been addressed primarily to the churches at and around Ephesus; and was designed, at least in part, to meet the germs of heresies which subsequently troubled the Christian Church. "For the maintenance of that fellowship with the Father and with the Son, which it is her main object to inculcate as essential to Christianity and necessary to salvation, the apostle insists on the necessity of walking in the light, of holding and exemplifying the truth as it is in Jesus. Errors of doctrine touching the person of Christ, and looseness of life touching the laws of morality, alike aggravate each other. The life is not in the right among

CHAPTER I.

Evidence given concerning Christ's person and excellency, ver. 1, 2; the knowledge thereof gives us communion with God and Christ, ver. 3; and joy, ver. 4; a description of God, ver. 5; how we are thereupon to walk, ver. 6; the benefit of such walking, ver. 7; the way to forgiveness, ver. 9; the evil of denying our sin, ver. 8—10.

AT which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; 2 (For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us;) 3 That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ. 4 And these things write we unto you, that your joy may be full.

The apostle omits his name and character, (as also the author to the Hebrews does), either out of humility, or as being willing that the Christian reader should be swayed by the light and weight of the things written, rather than by the name that might recommend them. And so he begins,

First. With an account or character of the Mediator's person. He is the great subject of the Gospel, the foundation and object of our faith and hope, the bond and cement that unite us unto God. He should be well known, and he is represented here.

1. As "the Word of life," ver. 1. In the Gospel these two are disjoined, and he is called, first, "the Word" Jno. i. 1, and afterward Life, intimating, withal, that he is intellectual life; "In him was life, and that life was," efficiently and objectively, "the light of men." Jno. i. 4. Here both are conjoined, "the Word of life," the vital word. In that he is the Word, it is intimated that he is the word of some person or other, and that is God, even the Father. He is the Word of God, and so he is intimated to issue from the Father, as truly (though not in the same manner) as a word (or speech, which is a train of words) from a speaker. But he is not a mere vocal word, (a bare λόγος προφορικὸς,) but a vital one. "The Word of life," the living word, and thereupon,

2. As eternal life. (Here, as in ch. v. 20, this life is spoken of in its source, not as in Scripture it mostly is, in its gracious emanations to the creature. Eternal life is put, by metonymy, for a Divine person, whose attribute it is, as God, both to have life in himself, and to be the sole Fountain of life to whomsoever he will. And the title is given with a special fitness and emphasis to that Person of the Holy Trinity whose condescending incarnation and redeeming merits are the procuring cause of new being and a blessed immortality to fallen man.) His duration shews his excellency. He was from eternity, and so is, in Scripture account, necessary, essential, uncreated life. That the apostle speaks of his eternity, a parte ante, as they say, and as from everlasting, seems evident, in that he speaks of him as he was in and from the beginning, when he was then with the Father, before his manifestation to us, yea, before the making of all things that were made, as Jno. i. 2, 3; so that he is the eternal, vital, intellectual Word of the eternal, living Father.

3. As life manifested, ver. 2; manifested in the flesh, manifested to us. The eternal Life would assume mortality, would put on flesh and blood, (in the entire human nature,) and so dwell among us, and converse with us, Jno. i. 14. Here was condescension and kindness indeed, that eternal Life (a person of eternal, essential life) should come to visit mortals, and to procure eternal life for them, and then confer it on them!

Secondly. With the evidences, and convictive assurances, that the apostle and his brethren had of the Mediator's presence and converse in the world. There were sufficient demonstrations of the reality of his abode here, and of the excellency and dignity of his person in the way of his manifestation. The Life, the Word of life, the eternal Life, as such, could not be seen and felt, but the life manifested might be, and was so. The Life was clothed with flesh, put on the state and habit of abased human nature, and as such gave sensible proof of its existence and transactions here. The Divine Life, or Word incarnate, presented and evinced itself to the very senses of the apostles, as,

1. To their ears; "That which we have heard," ver. 1, 3. The Life assumed a mouth and tongue, that he might utter words of life. The apostles not only heard of him, but they heard him himself. Above three years might they attend his ministry, and be auditors of his public sermons and private expositions, (for he expounded them in the house,) and be charmed with the words of him that spake as never man spake before or since. The Divine Word would employ the ear, and the ear should be devoted to the Word of life. And it was meet that they that were to be his representatives and imitators to the world should be personally acquainted with his ministrations.

2. To their eyes; "That which we have seen with our eyes," ver. 1—3. The Word would become visible, would not only be heard, but be seen,—seen publicly, privately, at distance, and at nearest approach, which may be intimated in the expression "with our eyes," with all the use and exercise that we could make of our eyes. We saw him in his life and ministry,—saw him in his transfiguration on the mount,—hanging, bleeding, dying, and dead upon the cross; and we saw him after his return from the grave and resurrection from the dead. His apostles must be eye-witnesses as well as ear-witnesses of him. "Wherefore, of these men that have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection," Acts i. 21, 22. And "we were eyewitnesses of his majesty," 2 Pet. i. 16.

3. To their internal sense, to the eyes of their mind; for so, possibly, may the next clause be interpreted, "which we have looked upon." This may be distinguished from the foregoing perception, "seeing with the eyes," and may be the same with what the apostle says in his Gospel, ch. i. 14, "And we beheld (ἐθεασαμεθα) his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father." Where the word is not applied to the immediate object of the eye, but that which was rationally collected from what they saw. What we have well discerned, contemplated, and viewed, what we have well known of this Word of life, we report to you. The senses are to be the informers of the mind.

4. To their hands and sense of feeling; "And our hands have handled" (touched and felt) "of the Word of life." This surely refers to the full conviction our Lord afforded his apostles of the truth, reality, solidity, and organization of his body, after his resurrection from the dead. When he shewed them his hands and his side, it is probable he gave them leave to touch him; at least he knew of Thomas's unbelief, and his professed resolution, too, not to believe till he had found and felt the places and signatures of the wounds by which he died. Accordingly, at the next congress he called Thomas, in the presence of the rest, to satisfy the very curiosity of his unbelief. And probably others of them did so too. "Our hands have handled of the Word of life." [This sentence is the crown of a climax, the force of which is, we cannot have been mistaken as to the facts whereto we testify. We have heard—yea, have seen with our own eyes—yea, more, have continually and familiarly looked upon—yea, more convincingly than all, have reverently handled—the embodied Word of life. With the multitude we have thronged, and with a certain woman touched, him; we have clasped and clung to him in times of danger; his hands have washed the feet of all his disciples; and one of us, whom Jesus loved, hath leaned on his breast at supper, and told the pulses of a heart such as had never beat in human breast before!—John felt it to be fully as important to prove that the Son of God was really made man, as to evince, by a higher order of evidence, that the Son of man is God.—Let it be noted, in the same connection, that the invisible Life and Word was no despiser of the testimony of sense.] Sense, in its place and sphere, is a means that God hath appointed, and the Lord Christ hath employed, for our information. Our Lord took care to satisfy, as far as might be, all the senses of his apostles, that they might be the more authentic witnesses of him to the world. They that apply all this to the hearing of the Gospel lose the variety of sensations here mentioned, and the propriety of the expressions, and the reason of their inculcation and repetition here. I say, "That which we have seen and heard," and found, "declare we unto you," ver. 3. The apostles could not be deceived in such long and various exercise of their sense. Sense must minister to reason and judgment, and reason and judgment must minister to the reception of the Lord Christ and his Gospel. The rejection of the Christian revelation is, at last, resolved into the rejection of sense itself: "He upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed them not who had seen him after he was risen," Mar. xvi. 14.

Thirdly. With a solemn assertion and attestation of these grounds and evidences of the Christian truth and doctrine the apostles publish these assurances for our satisfaction: "We bear witness, and shew unto you," ver. 2; "that which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you," ver. 3. It became the apostles to open to the disciples the evidence by which they were led, the reasons by which they were constrained to proclaim and propagate the Christian doctrine in the world. Wisdom and integrity obliged them to demonstrate that it was not either private fancy or a cunningly devised fable that they presented to the world. Evident truth would open their mouths and force a public profession; "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard," Acts iv. 20. It concerned the disciples to be well assured of the truth of the institution they had embraced. They should see the evidences of their holy religion. It fears not the light, nor the most judicious examination; it is able to afford rational conviction, and solid persuasion of mind and conscience; "I would that ye knew what great conflict I have" (or concern of mind) "for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh, that their hearts might be knit together in love, and unto all riches of full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, even of the Father, and of Christ," Col. ii. 1, 2.

"We have seen it, and bear witness." Note here, again, that the peculiar commission of the apostles was to bear witness of the great facts which were at the foundation of Christianity; and that their indispensable qualification for that office was their having personally and familiarly been witness to them: see Jno. xv. 27; Acts i. 21, 22, &c. In the apostleship, therefore, as distinct from the ordinary pastoral ministry, they could have no successors, and never have had any in men, who, however well qualified in other respects, have not seen and heard for themselves that which they have ministerially declared,—who neither were with the Lord before or after his resurrection, nor have ever been favoured, (like one that was born out of due time,) with the equivalent of a miraculous vision of him. No! plain Christian ministers must repudiate the fanaticism of a transmitted apostleship, and must take with thankfulness a lower place. Called of God through his church, we may teach and disseminate the same substantial truth as did the chosen witnesses,—but not with the same personal authority; because that was derived in their case, as to the sensible facts of the Gospel, from their claim of personal knowledge, and as to its supernatural doctrines, from their possession of supernatural gifts. We are neither proper witnesses nor infallible enunciators of the truth, but accepted reporters and publishers of it at second-hand, that is, on the written testimony (not more accessible to us than to millions besides,) of these apostles, and of their Master. That testimony makes up, together with the ancient Scriptures, the one only Word of God; and our simple yet solemn office, as Christian preachers—not without special promises of the Spirit—is to recite, expound, and enforce its faultless teachings.]

Fourthly. With the reason of the apostle's exhibiting and asserting this summary of sacred faith, and this breviate of evidence attending it. And this reason is twofold:—

1. That the believers of it may be advanced to the same happiness with them, (with the apostles themselves); "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye may have fellowship with us," ver. 3. The apostle means not personal fellowship, or consociation in the same church administrations, but such as is consistent with personal distance from each other. It is communion with heaven, and in blessings that come from thence, and tend thither. This we declare and testify, that you may share with us in our privileges and happiness. Gospel spirits, or those that are made happy by gospel grace, would fain have others happy too. We see, also, there is a fellowship or communion that runs through the whole church of God. There may be some personal distinctions and peculiarities, but there is a communion (or common participation of privilege and dignity) belonging to all saints, from the highest apostle to the lowest believer. As there is the same precious faith, there are the same precious promises dignifying and crowning that faith, and the same precious blessings and glories enriching and filling those promises. Now, that believers may be ambitious of this communion, that they may be instigated to retain and hold fast the faith that is the means of such communion, that the apostles as so may manifest their love to the disciples in assisting them to the same communion with themselves, they indicate what it is, and where it is; "And classes characterised by practical or systematic indifference to modes of faith" (Webster and Wilkinson).

i. 1. "Was:" compare John i. 1. The verb signifies uncreated existence, as contrasted with "to become." The Word "was," but the Word "became" flesh. The subject in this verse is resumed in verse 3. (Compare Prov. viii. 23.)

i. 2. Parenthesis introduced, justifying the expression, "Word of life." The Life, the source of all life (John i. 4). "Eternal life:"

"He joins 'eternal' to 'life,' he joins 'life' to 'God.' If the life is that which was manifested in Christ, in his words and acts, it is a life of gentleness, justice, truth. You cannot measure these by the clocks; you do not wish or try to measure them. You never did so when you were thinking about the gentleness, or justice, or truth of a friend. . . . He who came into the world and showed forth that life in it whereof St. John speaks, said, 'I come from a Father; my life is the image of his life, therefore it is an eternal life'" (Maurice).

truly our fellowship," or communion, "is with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ." We have communion with the Father (and with the Son of the Father, as, 2 Jno. 3, he is most emphatically styled) in our happy relation to them, in our receiving heavenly blessings from them, and in our spiritual converse with them. We have now such supernatural conversation with God and the Lord Christ as is an earnest and foretaste of our everlasting abode with them, and enjoyment of them, in the heavenly glory. See to what the gospel revelation tends—to advance us far above sin and earth, and to carry us to blessed communion with the Father and the Son. See for what end the eternal life was made flesh—that he might advance us to eternal life in communion with the Father and himself. See how far those live beneath the dignity, use, and end of the Christian faith and institution, who have not spiritual, blessed communion with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ.

"With the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." Frequently in the epistles, when the name of the First Person of the Trinity is coupled with that of the Second—particularly if to the latter be affixed some designation of the Son's economical character, such as Jesus Christ—the great truth seems to be expressed, that the Father can only be known, worshipped, and enjoyed, in and through the Son. To understand this, we must farther notice, that the Father not seldom in the New Testament represents the pure Godhead—the whole triune Deity, as being Tous et Principium Deitatis; while the Son, (although so called properly with respect to his Divine relation and nature,) stands out distinctly, in these particular connections, as that God-man Mediator in whom alone, by the agency of the co-eternal Spirit, the Deity is brought near to man. Fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ is not, therefore, some sort of mystical communion with each distinctly, as a subsistence in the glorious Godhead; neither do we think that the language refers to the Christian's privileged acquaintance with the Father and the Son in those various relations of grace which they are severally pleased to sustain,—with the Father, for instance, as our adopting, or with the Son as our atoning, God. It rather expresses our adoring intercourse with Jehovah as maintained solely by means of our believing intercourse with Emmanuel. Fellowship with the Father is real religion; fellowship with the Son Jesus Christ is, specifically and emphatically, evangelism. And St. John would teach us that those sentiments are, like their respective immediate objects, inseparable, and essentially one. There is no religion for sinful man except in the way of the Gospel; and hence the necessity for the foregoing explicit declaration of its fundamental truth.]

2. That believers may be enlarged and advanced in holy joy; "And these things write we unto you that your joy may be full," ver. 4. The gospel dispensation is not properly a dispensation of fear, sorrow, and dread, but of peace and joy. Terror and astonishment may well attend mount Sinai, but exultation and joy mount Zion, where appears the eternal Word, the eternal life, manifested in our flesh. The mystery of the Christian religion is directly calculated for the joy of mortals. It should be joy to us that the eternal Son should come to seek and save us, that he has made a full atonement for our sins, that he has conquered sin and death, and hell, that he lives as our Intercessor and Advocate with the Father, and that he will come again to perfect and glorify his persevering believers. And therefore those live beneath the use and end of the Christian revelation who are not filled with spiritual joy. Believers should rejoice in their happy relation to God, as his sons and heirs, his beloved and adopted—in their happy relation to the Son of the Father, as being members of his beloved body, and co-heirs with himself—in the pardon of their sins, the sanctification of their natures, the adoption of their persons, and the prospect of grace and glory that will be revealed at the return of their Lord and Head from heaven. Were they confirmed in their holy faith, how would they rejoice! "The disciples were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost," Acts xiii. 52.

5 This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. 6 If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: 7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

The apostle, having declared the truth and dignity of the author of the Gospel, brings a message or report from him, from which a just conclusion is to be drawn for the consideration and conviction of the professors of religion, or professed entertainers of this glorious Gospel.

First. Here is the message or report that the apostle avers to come from the Lord Jesus: "This then is the message which we have heard of him," ver. 5, of his Son Jesus Christ. As he was the immediate sender of the apostles, so he is the principal person spoken of in the preceding context, and the next antecedent also to whom the pronoun 'him' can relate. The apostles and apostolical ministers are the messengers of the Lord Jesus; it is their honour, the chief they pretend to, to bring his mind and messages to the world and to the churches. This is the wisdom and present dispensation of the Lord Jesus, to send his messages to us by persons like ourselves. He that put on human nature will honour earthen vessels. It was the ambition of the apostles to be found faithful, and faithfully to deliver the errands and messages they had received. What was communicated to them they were solicitous to impart; "This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you." A message from the Word of life, from the eternal Word, we should gladly receive; and the present one is this, (relating to the nature of God whom we are to serve, and with whom we should covet all indulged communion,) "That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all," ver. 5.

"The message which we have heard of him." Mark a striking change in the mode of speaking. Of the appearance of the living Word in human nature John had boldly and earnestly borne witness; but concerning the glorious character of Jehovah, and the majestic moral altitude in which he receives the advances of his various worshippers, even an apostle could no more than convey a message from that Word himself. The reason is apparent, and impressive. The first-mentioned fact belonged to that class of earthly things, palpable to sense, and within the knowledge of many besides the chosen official witnesses, which our Lord rebuked Nicodemus (Jno. xxx.) for not believing on other testimony besides His own. But the character and counsels of the great God, on the contrary, are among those eminently heavenly things which no man (not having ascended up to heaven,) could possibly know or make known, except by revelation, either verbally from "him that came down from heaven, even the Son of man, which is in heaven," or mentally from that Divine Spirit who also "searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God." John had derived his elementary knowledge of these sublime realities from the former source; and from the latter he drew those ampler disclosures of them which this glorious epistle reflects.]

This report asserts the excellency of the Divine nature. He is all that beauty and perfection that can be represented to us by light. He is a self-active, uncompounded spirituality, purity, wisdom, holiness, and glory. And then the absolute fullness of that excellency and perfection. There is no defect or imperfection, no mixture of any thing alien or contrary to absolute excellency, no mutability nor capacity of any decay in him; "In him is no darkness at all," ver. 5. Or this report may more immediately relate to what is usually called the moral perfection of the Divine nature, what we are to imitate, or what is more directly to influence us in our gospel work. And so it will comprehend the holiness of God, the absolute purity of his nature and will, his penetrative knowledge (particularly of hearts), his jealousy and justice, which burn as a most bright and vehement flame. It is meet that to this dark world the great God should be represented as pure and perfect light. It is the Lord Jesus that best of all opens to us the name and nature of the unsearchable God: "The only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, the same hath declared him." It is the prerogative of the Christian revelation to bring us the most noble, the most august and agreeable, account of the blessed God; such as is most suitable to the light of reason and what is demonstrable thereby, most suitable to the magnificence of his works round about us, and to the nature and office of him that is the supreme administrator, governor, and judge of the world. What more (relating to and comprehensive of all such perfection) could be included in one word than in this, "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." Then,

Secondly. There is a just conclusion to be drawn from this message and report, and that for the consideration and conviction of professors of religion, or professed entertainers of this Gospel. This conclusion issues into two branches:—

1. For the conviction of such professors as have no true fellowship with God: "If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." It is known that to walk, in Scripture account, is to order and frame the course and actions of the moral life, that is, of the life so far as it is capable of subjection to the Divine law. To "walk in darkness" is to live and act according to such ignorance, error, and erroneous practice, as are contrary to the fundamental dictates of our holy religion. [More distinctly, as purity, benevolence, wisdom, moral beauty, and holy happiness, each finds its expressive and pleasing emblem in some one of the properties of light,—so whatever in the spirit or practice of a professor is opposed to those godlike qualities is necessarily a thing of darkness. Nay, the simple absence of light is darkness; and, in like manner, the absence of holiness, which ensues whenever God's good Spirit withdraws his shining from the soul—that of itself is sin. They with whom this state is habitual (as it is, alas! with all the unregenerate,) are said to walk in darkness. Gross works of darkness, hidden practices of iniquity, doubtless deepen the condemnation of the sinner; but the darkness itself, the simple want of loving, spiritual, and happy affections is enough to shew that there is no permanent irradiation from God, and to rebuke the profession of fellowship with him.] Now there may be those who may pretend to great attainments and enjoyments in religion; they may profess to have communion with God, and yet their lives may be irreligious, immoral, and impure. To such the apostle would not fear to give the lie: "They lie, and do not the truth." They belie God, for he holds no heavenly fellowship or intercourse with unholy souls. What communion hath light with darkness? They belie themselves, or lie concerning themselves; for they have no such communications from God nor access to him. There is no truth in their profession nor in their practice, or their practice gives their profession and pretences the lie, and demonstrates the folly and falsehood of them.

2. For the conviction and consequent satisfaction of those that are near to God: "But if we walk in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." As the blessed God is the eternal, boundless light, and the Mediator is, from him, the light of the world, so the Christian institution is the great luminary that appears in our sphere, and shines here below. A conformity to this in spirit and practice demonstrates fellowship or communion with God. Those that so walk shew that they know God, that they have received of the Spirit of God, and that the Divine impress or image is stamped upon their souls.

"In the light." The glory of the Divine excellence, the very nature of holiness in God, is a dazzling mystery. When we attempt to elucidate the apostle's brief sentence on this subject by earthly comparisons or analogies, we feel like him who, in presence even of the transfigured Son of man, wist not what to say. But we do know what constitutes sanctity in a Christian, and can conceive several reasons why it should be described as it is above. For instance, 1. Christian holiness springs from an illumined mind, a true and spiritual knowledge of Christianity. 2. Its actions are such as will bear the light, and even court it. 3. Its principle and spirit in many respects resemble that greatest glory of the material creation—in this, particularly, (to adopt a familiar metaphor of Bishop Horne's,) that, like the light, a holy character may come in contact with much that is corrupt and impure, and yet pass through all undefiled, Jas. i. 27; 2 Pet. i. 4. "We walk in the light, as he is in the light." Let us be suitably impressed with the infinite moral disparity between God and the most godly of men. He is in the light; nay, he is light, "and in him is no darkness at all;" in him, truth, rectitude, and goodness are essential, unaugmentable, immaculate. The best of men, on the contrary, have all needed to be brought out of darkness into light; and even now they need to walk therein according to rule rather than instinct; with measured advances towards even a comparative perfection; with considerate and watchful steps; and with a constant care to maintain nearness to him in whose light alone they shine. For let us mark what follows:—If we walk in the light as he is in the light,—if we are habitually and progressively holy, as he which hath called us is essentially and infinitely holy,—then we verify our professions; we give evidence that we have fellowship one with another,—saint with saint, and all with a sanctifying God,—and that the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. Only by such communications with and from God could we have been made thus life unto him; and again, only through fellowship with the Son, and by the virtue of his atoning blood, could we have attained fellowship with the Father, so as to have received from him the effusions of his purifying and transforming Spirit. Hence we are said here to be cleansed from sin by that blood, and elsewhere to have become light in the Lord; that is, we are more or less beautified with holiness, it is altogether by the beams of that grace, which the Lord Jesus as our wisdom has revealed, as our righteousness has entitled us to claim, as our sanctification has poured down upon our souls, and as our redemption will crown with the full glories of life and incorruption. This view of the connection between the first and the two latter clauses of the 7th verse we deem not only correct, but highly important. There is, however, a different one adopted by some expositors, which reverses the foregoing order in the experiences of sanctified persons, and which may be expressed as follows.]

i. 3 "Fellowship:" one of the key-words of the epistle. St. John desires that they also who had not seen or handled might share in that fellowship which those who had seen enjoyed. He proceeds to state what that fellowship was.

i. 5. "God is light:" There is not one dark spot in this Being; not one evil, malicious thought against any creature whom he has formed. All is clear, unbroken light. And this word 'light' is at once the simplest, and the fullest, and the deepest which can be used in human discourse. . . . It does not only tell of a goodness and truth without a flaw, it tells of a goodness and truth that are always seeking to spread themselves abroad, to send forth rays that shall penetrate everywhere and scatter the darkness which opposes them" (Maurice's "Lectures").

i. 6. "He introduces, in order to refute, the errors of two opposite classes: first, of those who claimed an interest in Christ while living in sin; and, secondly, of those who would not acknowledge themselves

"Then we have fellowship one with another," they with us, and we with them, and both with God, in his blessed or beatific communication to us. And this is one of those beatific communications to us, that his Son's blood or death is applied or imputed to us; "The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." The eternal life, the eternal Son, hath put on flesh and blood, and so became Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ hath shed his blood for us, or died to wash us from our sins in his blood. His blood applied to us discharges us from the guilt of all sin, both original and actual, inherent and committed; and so far we stand righteous in his sight; and not only so, but his blood procures for us those sacred influences by which sin is to be subdued more and more till it is quite abolished, Gal. iii. 13, 14.

8 If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. 9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. 10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

Here, First. The apostle, having supposed that even those of this heavenly communion have yet their sin, proceeds here to justify that supposition; and this he does by shewing the dreadful consequences of denying it, and that in two particulars:—

1. "If we say, We have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us," ver. 8. We must beware of deceiving ourselves in denying or excusing our sins. The more we see them, the more we shall esteem and value the remedy. If we deny them, the truth is not in us, either the truth that is contrary to such denial (we lie in denying our sin), or the truth of religion is not in us. The Christian religion is the religion of sinners, of such as have sinned, and in whom sin in some measure still dwells. The Christian life is a life of continued repentance, humiliation for and mortification of sin, of continual faith in, thankfulness for, and love to the Redeemer, and hopeful, joyful expectation of a day of glorious redemption, in which the believer shall be fully and finally acquitted, and sin abolished for ever.

2. "If we say, We have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us," ver. 10. The denial of our sin not only deceives ourselves, but reflects dishonour upon God. It challenges his veracity. He has abundantly testified of, and testified against, the sin of the world. "And the Lord said in his heart," (determined thus with himself,) "I will not again curse the ground" (as he had then lately done) "for man's sake; for" (or, with the learned Bishop Patrick, 'though,') "the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth," Gen. viii. 21. But God has given his testimony to the continued sin and sinfulness of the world, by providing a sufficient, effectual sacrifice for sin, that will be needed in all ages, and to the continued sinfulness of believers themselves, by requiring them continually to confess their sins, and apply themselves by faith to the blood of that sacrifice. And therefore, if we say either that we have not sinned, or do not yet sin, "the word of God is not in us," neither in our minds, as to the acquaintance we should have with it, nor in our hearts, as to the practical influence it should have upon us.

Secondly. The apostle then instructs the believer in the way to the continued pardon of his sin. Here we have,

1. His duty in order thereto; "If we confess our sins," ver. 9. Penitent confession and acknowledgment of sin are the believer's business, and the means of his deliverance from his guilt. And,

2. His encouragement thereto, and assurance of the happy issue. This is the veracity, righteousness, and clemency of God, to whom he makes such confession; "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness," ver. 9. God is faithful to his covenant and word, wherein he has promised forgiveness to penitent, believing confessors. He is just to himself and his glory, who has provided such a sacrifice, by which his righteousness is declared in the justification of sinners. He is just to his Son, who has not only sent him for such service, but promised to him that those who come through him shall be forgiven on his account. "By his knowledge" (by the believing apprehension of him) "shall my righteous servant justify many," Isa. liii. 11. He is clement and gracious also, and so will forgive to the contrite confessor all his sins, cleanse him from the guilt of all unrighteousness, and in due time deliver him from the power and practice of it.

CHAPTER II.

Here the apostle encourages against sins of infirmity, ver. 1, 2; shews the true knowledge and love of God, ver. 3–6; renews the precept of fraternal love, ver. 7–11; addresses the several ages of Christians, ver. 12–14; warns against worldly love, ver. 15–17; against seducers, ver. 18, 19; shews the security of true Christians, ver. 20–27; and advises to abide in Christ, ver. 28, 29.

My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: 2 And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for our's only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

These verses relate to the concluding subject of the foregoing chapter, in which the apostle proceeds upon the supposition of the real Christian's sin; and he here gives them both dissuasion and support.

First, Dissuasion. He would leave no room for sin; "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not," ver. 1. The design or purport of this letter, the design of what I have just said concerning communion with God, and the overthrow of it by an irreligious course, [and also concerning the rich provision which is made in Christ for your inward sanctification,] is to dissuade and drive you from sin. See the familiar, affectionate compellation with which he introduces his admonition: "My little children," children as having perhaps been begotten by his Gospel; "little children," as being much beneath him in age and experience; "my little children," as being dear to him in the bonds of the Gospel. Certainly the Gospel most prevailed where and when such ministerial love most abounded. Or perhaps the judicious reader will find reason to think that the apostle's meaning in this dissuasion or caution is this, or amounts to this reading, "These things write I unto you, not that you sin." And so the words will look back to what he had said before concerning the assured pardon of sin; "God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins," &c., ch. i. 9. And so the words are a preclusion of all abuse of such favour and indulgence. Though sins will be forgiven to penitent confessors, yet this I write, not to encourage you in sin, but upon another account. Or this clause will look forward to what the apostle is going to say about the Advocate for sinners; and so it is a prolepsis, a prevention of the like mistake or abuse; These things write I unto you, not that you sin, but that you may see your remedy for sin. And so the following particle, as the learned know, may be rendered adversatively; "But, if a man sin," he may know his help and cure. And so we see.

Secondly. The believer's support and relief in case of sin; "And" (or 'but') "if any man sin," (any of us, or of our aforesaid communion,) "we have an Advocate with the Father," &c., ver. 1. Believers themselves, those that are advanced to a happy gospel state, have yet their sins. There is a great distinction therefore between the sinners that are in the world. There are Christianized (such as are instated in the sacred, saving privileges of Christ's mystical or spiritual body) and unchristianized, converted and unconverted sinners. There are some who, though they really sin, yet, in comparison with others, are said not to sin, as ch. iii. 9. Believers, as they have an atonement applied unto them at their entrance into a state of pardon and justification, so they have an Advocate in heaven, still to continue to them that state, and procure their continued forgiveness. And this must be the support, satisfaction, and refuge of believers (or real Christians) in or upon their sins; "We have an Advocate." The original name is sometimes given to the Holy Ghost, and then it is rendered, "the Comforter." He acts within us; he puts pleas and arguments into our hearts and mouths; and so is our Advocate, by teaching us to intercede for ourselves. But here is an Advocate without us, in heaven and with the Father. The proper office and business of an advocate is with the judge; with him he pleads the client's cause. The Judge with whom our Advocate pleads is the Father, his Father and ours. He who was our Judge in the legal court (the court of the violated law) is our Father in the gospel court, the court of heaven and of grace. His throne or tribunal is the mercy-seat. And he that is our Father is also our Judge, the supreme Arbitrator of our state and circumstances, either for life or death, for time or eternity; "You have come to God, the Judge of all," Heb. xii. 23. That believers may be encouraged to hope that their cause will go well, as their Judge is represented to them in the relation of a Father, so their Advocate is recommended to them upon these considerations:—

1. By his person and personal names; "It is Jesus Christ the Son of the Father," one anointed by the Father for the whole office of mediation, the whole work of salvation, and consequently for that of the intercessor or advocate.

2. By his qualification for the office; "It is Jesus Christ the righteous," the righteous one in the court and sight of the Judge. This is not so necessary in another advocate. Another advocate, or an advocate in another court, may be an unjust person himself, and yet may have a just cause, and the cause of a just person in that case, to plead, and may accordingly carry his cause. But here the clients are guilty; their innocence and legal righteousness cannot be pleaded; their sin must be confessed or supposed. It is the Advocate's own righteousness that he must plead for the criminals. He has been righteous to the death, righteous for them; he has brought in everlasting righteousness. This the Judge will not deny. Upon this score he pleads that the clients' sins may not be imputed to them.

3. By the plea he has to make, the ground and basis of his advocacy; "And he is the propitiation for our sins," ver. 2. He is the expiatory victim, the propitiatory sacrifice that has been offered to the Judge for all our offences against his majesty, and law, and government. In vain do the professors of Rome distinguish between an advocate of redemption and an advocate of intercession, or a mediator of such different service. The Mediator of intercession, the Advocate for us, is the Mediator of redemption the propitiation for our sins. It is his propitiation that he pleads. And we might be apt to suppose that his blood had lost its value and efficacy if no mention had been made of it in heaven since the time it was shed. But now we see it is of esteem there, since it is continually represented in the intercession of the great Advocate (the attorney-general) for the church of God. He ever lives to make intercession for those that come to God through him.

4. By the extent of his plea, the latitude of his propitiation. It is not confined to one nation, and not particularly to the ancient Israel of God; "He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only," (not only for the sins of us Jews, us that are Abraham's seed according to the flesh,) "but also for those of the whole world," ver. 2; not only for the past, or us present believers, but for the sins of all who shall hereafter believe on him, or come to God through him. The extent and intent of the Mediator's death reach to all tribes, nations, and countries. As he is the only, so he is the universal, atonement and propitiation for all that are saved and brought home to God, and [restored] to his favour and forgiveness. [Or the meaning may more naturally be this: Jesus Christ is the propitiation for our sins,—for the backslidings, the wanderings, and the haltings, of us his people, whom he hath called into his light, and whom he enables habitually to walk therein. Nor does he propitiate Divine justice for the sins of such only, but also for the sins, far more grievous and condemning, of those who have never yet sought or experienced this great salvation. The repenting are pardoned, and the impenitent spared "in hope," through the sprinkling of the same blood.]

3 And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. 4 He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. 5 But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him. 6 He that saith he abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.

These verses,—[although they form a natural sequel to ver. 1 and 2, and present fresh guards against the abuse of those most precious doctrines of grace which are enshrined in that and in some preceding parts of the context, sinners, and therefore denied the necessity of a redeemer, intercessor, and sanctifier" (Webster and Wilkinson).

ii. 1. "My little children:" a term of endearment appropriately used by one who was far advanced in years and the last of the apostles, and round whom was a new generation, many of whom he had watched over from the first. It spoke, too, of a tenderer relation between him and his Ephesian flock than the use of any merely official title. Mr. Maurice well observes, "It is a sad day for churches, yes, and for nations, when men begin to regard themselves chiefly as officials sent forth by some central government to do its jobs, and not as men who are bound by sacred affinities and actual relations to those whom they preside over" ("Lectures"). "That ye sin not;" "In order (purpose in thus writing) that ye may not sin;" the tense employed implying the absence not only of the habit, but of single acts of sin" (Alford). "Advocate;" "paraclete," same word as used of the Holy Ghost (John xiv. 16).

yet to other readers,]—may seem to relate to the seventh verse of the former chapter; [as if] between that and these verses there occurred an incidental discourse concerning the believer's duty and relief in case of sin, occasioned by the mention of one of the believer's privileges; namely, his being cleansed from sin by the Mediator's blood. In that verse the apostle asserts the beneficial consequence of walking in the light; we have then fellowship with one another, such Divine fellowship and communion as is the prerogative of the church of Christ. Here now succeeds the trial or test of our light and of our love.

First. The trial of our light: "And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments," ver. 3. Divine light and knowledge is the beauty and improvement of the mind. It becomes the disciples of the Mediator to be persons of wisdom and understanding. Young Christians are apt to magnify their new light, and applaud their own knowledge, especially if it has been suddenly, or in a short time, communicated; and old ones are apt to suspect the sufficiency and fulness of their knowledge. They lament that they know God, and Christ, and the rich contents of his Gospel, no more. But here is the evidence of the soundness of our knowledge, if it constrain us to keep God's commands. Each perfection of his nature enforces his authority. The wisdom of his counsels, the riches of his grace, the grandeur of his works, recommend his law and government. A careful, conscientious obedience to his commands shews that the apprehension and knowledge of these things is graciously impressed upon the soul. And thereupon it must follow in the reverse that "he that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him," ver. 4. Professors of the truth are often ashamed of their ignorance, or ashamed to own it; they frequently pretend to great attainments in the knowledge of Divine mysteries; "Thou makest thy boast of God, and knowest his will, and approvest," in thy rational judgment, "the things that are more excellent; being instructed out of the law, and art confident that thou thyself art," or art fit to be "a guide to the blind," &c., Rom. ii. 17, &c. But what knowledge of God can that be that sees not that he is most worthy of the most entire and intense obedience? And if that be seen and known, how vain and superficial is even that knowledge when it sways not the heart unto obedience? A disobedient life is the confutation and shame of pretended religious knowledge; it gives the lie to such boasts and pretences, and shews that there is neither religion nor honesty in them.

[It is very plain, however, and very important to be noted, that the relative "him" in these four verses refers to the immediate antecedent, namely, "Jesus Christ the righteous." And the meaning is, that "hereby we do know that we know him," experimentally, in all those evangelical and saving relations which have just been unfolded, "if we keep his," Christ's, "commandments;" if we cherish, that is, the whole moral law of God as spiritually expounded and amplified by him, and more especially, that one particular application of it which, for certain reasons, he has termed his own, and even his new, commandment. With what exquisite skill does love's own disciple and apostle approach his favourite theme, and bespeak for it the affection of his Christian readers! As if he would say, He whom we know and bless as our propitiation, our righteousness, our advocate—our fountain of life, and light, and joy—our Lord that bought us, and our God that was made flesh for us—what commands may he not lay upon our willing gratitude? And, of all his commands, what one more welcome than this, that we walk in love, even as Christ loved us? Nay, how can we have known him as our Saviour, or how can we prove that we "abide in the light" of his grace, unless we be thereby conformed to his law, and to his likeness?]

Secondly. The trial of our love: "But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected; hereby know we that we are in him," ver. 5. To keep the word of God, or of Christ, is sacredly to attend thereto in all the conduct and motion of life. In him that does so is "the love of God perfected." Possibly, some may here understand God's love to us;—[of which we have seen such bright displays in the opening of this epistle, in the incarnation of God's own Son, and the absolution and sanctification of believers through his blood.] To be sure, his love to us cannot be perfected, or [according to the proper force of that term] obtain its perfect design and fruit [in us], without our practical observance of his word. We are chosen to be holy and blameless before him in love; we are redeemed, to be a peculiar people, zealous of good works; we are pardoned and justified, that we may be partakers of larger measures of the Divine Spirit for sanctification; we are sanctified, that we may walk in ways of holiness and obedience. No act of Divine love, that here terminates upon us, obtains its proper tendency, issue, and effect, without our holy attendance to God's word. But [perhaps] the phrase rather denotes here our love to God. So, ver. 15, "The love of" (that is, to) "the Father is not in him;" so ch. iii. 17, "How dwelleth the love of" (that is, to) "God in him?" Now light is to kindle love; and love must, and will, keep the word of God. It inquires wherein the beloved may be pleased and served; and, finding he will be so by an observance of his declared will, there it employs and exerts itself; there love is demonstrated; there it has its perfect or complete exercise, operation, and delight. And "hereby," by this dutiful attendance to the will of God or Christ, "know we that we are in him," ver. 5. We know that we belong to him, and that we are united to him by that Spirit that elevates and assists us to this obedience. And if we acknowledge our relation to him, and our union with him, it must have this continued enforcement upon us, "He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself to walk as he walked," ver. 6. The Lord Christ was an inhabitant of this world, and walked here below. Here he gave a shining example of absolute obedience to God. [As God, of God, he is light, of light, and eternally in the light; but as the Son of Man he deigned to walk in all the paths of a regulated and obedient holiness, so as to become a fit exemplar to the sanctified from among men.] They that profess to be on his side, and to abide with him, must [therefore] walk with him, walk after his pattern and example. The partizans of the several sects of philosophers of old paid great regard to the dictates and practice of their respective teachers and sect-masters. Much more should the Christian (he that professes to abide in and with Christ,) aim to resemble his infallible Master and Head, and conform to his course and prescriptions; "Then are ye my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command ye," Jno. xv. 14.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment which ye had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning. 8 Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you: because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth. 9 He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. 10 He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. 11 But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes.

The seventh verse may be supposed either to look backward to what immediately preceded—and then it is walking as Christ walked that is here represented as no new, but an old commandment; it is that which the apostles would certainly inculcate wherever they brought Christ's Gospel; or [the words may be taken] to look forward to what the apostle is now going to recommend, and that is the law of fraternal love. This is the message "heard from the beginning," ch. iii. 11; and the old commandment, 2 Jno. 5. Now, while the apostle addresses himself to the recommendation of such a practice, he is ready to give an instance thereof in his affectionate appellation, "Brethren," you that are dear to me in the bond of that love to which I would solicit you, And so the precept of fraternal love is recommended.

First. As an old one: "I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning," ver. 7. The precept of love must be as old as human nature; but it might admit divers enactments, enforcements, and motives. In the state of innocence (had human nature then been propagated) men must have loved one another, as being of one blood, made to dwell on the earth; as being God's offspring, and bearing his image. In the state of sin and promised recovery they must love one another; as related to God their Maker, as related to each other by blood [Divine], and as partners in the same hope. When the Hebrews were peculiarly incorporated they must, accordingly, love each other, as being the privileged people, whose were the covenants and the adoption, and of whose race the Messiah and Head of the church must spring. And the law of love must be conveyed, with new obligations, to the new Israel of God, to the gospel church; and so it is "the old commandment," or the word which the children of the gospel Israel "have heard from the beginning," ver. 7.

Secondly. As a new one. Again (to constrain you to this duty the more) "a new commandment I write unto you;" the law of the new society, the Christian corporation. "Which thing is true in him." The matter of which was first true in and concerning the Head of it. The truth of it was first, and was abundantly, in him. He loved the church, and gave himself for it. "And in you." This law is, in some measure, written upon your hearts. Ye are taught of God to love one another; and that because (or since, or forasmuch as) "the darkness is past," the darkness of your prejudiced, unconverted (whether Jewish or Gentile) minds; your deplorable ignorance of God and of his Christ is now passed, "and the true light now shineth," ver. 8. The light of evangelical revelation hath shone with life and efficacy into your hearts. Hence you have seen the excellency of Christian love, and the fundamental obligation thereto. Hence we see the fundamentals, and particularly the fundamental precepts, of the Christian religion may be represented either as new or old. The reformed doctrine, or doctrine of religion in the reformed churches, is new and old. New, as taught, after long darkness, by the lights of the reformation; new, as purged from the adulterations of Rome; but old, as having been taught and heard from the beginning. We should see that that grace or virtue that was true in Christ should be true also in us. We should be conformable to our Head. The more our darkness is past, and gospel light shines into us, the deeper should our subjection be to the commandments of our Lord, whether considered as old or new.

[It is not unlikely that by the "old commandment" is meant that relating to general purity of life, as expressed in ver. 29; ch. iii. 3–11, &c.; and, by the "new commandment,"—which was so designated by Christ himself, and which is ceaselessly enforced throughout this epistle,—the commandment that (having believed on the name of Jesus Christ,) we believers should "love one another." Alusively, the two classes of things are conjoined, yet clearly distinguished, in ch. iii. 10. Now, it is true that the principle of the latter duty, the principle of mutual love, has pervaded the whole moral system of revealed religion from the beginning: that principle, therefore, is no new matter of requirement. But the form or direction of it in this particular commandment is "new." A general philanthropy, on the one hand, or else, on the other, an exclusive, and, at the same time, too indiscriminating, love for their own nation and national church, was the only impress left by the second table of the moral law on the mind and character of the devout Jews before Christ. This, at least, was all they could retain, after that the law itself had come to be incrustated with traditions, or in parts worn down and reduced by interpretation. Comprehensively, mankind were their "brethren;" in a special and religious sense, Jews were so; and only as fellow-men, or as co-members of the commonwealth of Israel, were they recognised and loved. Now, without discrediting either of these sentiments,—nay, while distinctly sanctioning each in its purer state and exercise,—our blessed Master has given express definition, and not only renewed but absolutely new force and attractions, to a sentiment markedly different from both. Brotherly love, as enjoined by him, has neither the latitude of philanthropy, nor the restricted, yet undiscerning, character of sectarianism. No! it is a spiritual affection, and can only be felt by, and towards, spiritual men. In a word, catholicity; the mutual love of true believers; of true believers as such; and, therefore, of believers only, and of all believers, without regard to national or ecclesiastical distinctions. This is the scope and point of the "new commandment." That commandment, written in the heart, creates, so to speak, a new virtue in the church of God. And this "thing is true in him, and in you;" this virtue was beautifully embodied in Christ's own distinguishing love towards those whom the Father had given him, and who had kept his word; and the same large yet eclectic charity was verified in a high degree—verified in its attainableness, its blessedness, and its fragrant, refreshing influence on general society—by true Christians in primitive times. And this new thing in the earth, (actually new, at least, when Christ's law first went forth,—and, alas! too much so, now that the law has been for centuries promulgated among us,) this new sentiment sprang up how or why? Because the darkness was past, and the true light now shone. Observe, dear Christian reader, Christ's new commandment arose naturally out of his new revelations. The law had long awaited the dawn of the Gospel, as requisite to the full development of its own meaning and spirit, and especially to a discovery of the perfect oneness in principle of its two great commandments. The gospel light broke forth and straightway revealed to its disciples, so as they had never perceived them before, on the one hand, the spirituality of God's nature and worship, and, on the other, (in the radiance of that primary truth,) the real unity of all spiritual men. Hence arose the natural reason and obligation of that which Christ soon embodied in a special command,—we mean the principle that spiritual men, as delighting in God, should, from the very ii 3–6. Holiness of life and obedience are evidences of knowledge of Christ. Likewise, as the commandments of God reflect his character, their observance will add to increased and assured knowledge of God. To be like Christ in heart is to be like him in life. If one or other side be wanting, there is falsehood.

ii. 7. "From the beginning;" from the time when they first heard the Gospel, or perhaps better still, from what follows, from the very beginning, for the law of love has always been incumbent upon men. It has, however, become new in the life and death of Christ, having thereby received new force.

ii. 8. "Which thing is true?" i.e., the fact that the commandment which is called old is also new.

ii. 9–12. Christ, the universal Brother, introduces men into the true state of brotherhood. A newer and higher state, a tenderer expression of the law of love, is thus introduced by Christ. To hate our brother, to refuse to take up our position in this brotherhood, is same radical affection, delight in and cleave to or another. If, therefore, we walk in the light of these and other gospel revelations, and if, at the same time, we feel the glow of evangelical and regenerate affections,—we shall certainly see in every Christian, in virtue of his sonship to God, a brother, and, in consequence of his nearness to Christ, a heart-neighbour, of our own; and we shall as certainly love him as ourselves. We shall love him, not merely as a fellow-man, but for the sake of his religious relations to God; and, again, not merely as an outward worshipper of God in our own forms, but because he worships him, whether in those forms or not, in spirit and in truth, and is made a partaker of the Divine nature. Thus, by calling forth a far more godlike affection than could arise out of any natural or ecclesiastical sympathies,—an affection which first soars to God, and from him descends to and finds its delight with those all, and those only, of the sons of men who bear his moral likeness,—in short, a love to brethren in Christ, which is but a refracted ray of our love to Christ, and truth, and holiness,—by calling forth such an affection, this “new commandment” has gained the glory of combining, in a singular degree, the religious element of the first with the social principle of the second table of the law, and so of developing its unity and perfection.]

Light should produce a suitable heat. Accordingly, here is another trial of our Christian light: before, it was to be approved by obedience to God; here, by Christian love.

1. He that wants such love in vain pretends his light; “He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now,” ver. 9. It is proper for sincere Christians to acknowledge what God has done for their souls. But in the visible church there are often those that assume to themselves more than is true. There are those that say they are in the light, the Divine revelation has made its impression upon their minds, and yet they walk in hatred and enmity towards their Christian brethren. These cannot be swayed by the sense of the love of Christ to their brethren; and therefore remain in their dark state, notwithstanding their pretended conversion to the Christian religion.

2. He that is managed by such love approves his light to be good and genuine; “He that loveth his brother,” as his brother in Christ, “abideth in the light,” ver. 10. He sees the foundation and reason of Christian love; he discerns the weight and value of the Christian redemption; he sees how meet it is that we should love those whom Christ hath loved; and then the consequence will be that “there is no occasion of stumbling in him,” ver. 10. He will be no scandal, no stumblingblock to his brother; he will conscientiously beware that he neither induce his brother to sin, nor turn him out of the way of religion. Christian love teaches us highly to value our brother’s soul, and dread every thing that will be injurious to his innocence and peace.

3. Hatred is a sign of spiritual darkness: “But he that hateth his brother is in darkness,” ver. 11. Spiritual light is instilled by the Spirit of grace; and one of the first-fruits of that Spirit is love. He, then, that is possessed with malignity towards the Christian brother must needs be destitute of spiritual light; consequently, “he walks in darkness,” ver. 11; his life is agreeable to a dark mind and conscience; “and he knows not whither he goes;” he sees not whither this dark spirit carries him, and particularly that it will carry him to the world of outer darkness: “Because that darkness hath blinded his eyes,” ver. 10. The darkness of ungenerosity, evidenced by a malignant spirit, is contrary to the light of life. Where that darkness dwells, the mind, the judgment, and the conscience will be darkened, and so will mistake the way to heavenly, endless life. Here we may observe how effectually our apostle is now cured of his once hot and flaming spirit. Time was when he was for calling for fire from heaven upon poor, ignorant Samaritans that received them not, Lu. ix. 54. But his Lord and shewn him that he knew not his own spirit, nor whither it led him. Having now imbibed more of the Spirit of Christ, he breathes out goodwill to man, and love to all the brethren. It is the Lord Jesus that is the great master of love; it is his school, his own church, that is the school of love. His disciples are disciples of love, and his family must be the family of love.

12 I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name’s sake. 13 I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one. I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father. 14 I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one. 15 Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. 16 For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. 17 And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever.

This new command of holy love, with the incentives thereto, [which are mentioned both before and after,] may possibly be directed [indeed we cannot doubt that they all are] to the several ranks of disciples that are here accosted. The several graduates in the Christian university (the catholic church) must be sure to preserve the bond of sacred love. Or, there being an important dehortation and dissuasion to follow,—without the observance of which vital religion, in the love of God, and love of the brethren, cannot subsist,—the apostle may justly seem to preface it with a solemn address to the several forms or orders in the school of Christ. Let the infants, (or minors,) the adult, the seniors, (or the adepts, the τέλειοι, ‘the most perfect,’ in the Christian institution know that they must not love this world; and so,

First. We have the address itself made to the various forms and ranks in the church of Christ. All Christians are not of the same standing and stature. There are babes in Christ, there are grown men, and old disciples. As these have their peculiar states, so they have their peculiar duties; but there are precepts and obedience that are common to them all, as particularly mutual love and contempt of the world. We see also that wise pastors will judiciously distribute the word of life, and give to the several members of Christ’s family their several suitable portions; I write unto you, children, fathers, and young men. In this distribution the apostle addresses, first, the lowest in the Christian school; “I write unto you, little children,” ver. 12. There are novices in religion, babes in Christ; those that are learning the rudiments of Christian godliness. The apostle may seem to encourage them, by applying to them first; and it may be useful to the greater proficients to hear what is said to their juniors. Elements are to be repeated. First principles are the foundation of all. He addresses the children in Christianity, upon two accounts:—

1. Because their sins were forgiven them for his name’s sake, ver. 12. The youngest sincere disciple is pardoned; the communion of saints is attended with the forgiveness of sins. Sins are forgiven, either for God’s name’s sake, for the praise of his glory, his glorious perfections displayed in forgiveness; or for Christ’s name’s sake, that is, upon his score, and upon the account of the redemption that is in him. And they that are forgiven of God are strongly obliged to relinquish this world, which so interferes with the love of God.

2. Because of their knowledge of God; “I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father,” ver. 13. Children are wont to know none so soon as their father. Children in Christianity must and do know God; “They shall all know me, from the least to the greatest,” Heb. viii. 11. Children in Christ should know that God is their Father; it is their wisdom. We say it is a wise child that knows his father; these children cannot but know theirs. They can well be assured by whose power they are regenerated, and by whose grace they are adopted. They that know the Father may well be withdrawn from the love of this world. Then the apostle proceeds, secondly, to those of the highest station and stature, to the seniors in Christianity, to whom he gives an honourable appellation; “I write unto you, fathers,” ver. 13, 14. To you, Mnsos, you old disciples, Acts xxi. 16. The apostle immediately passes from the bottom to the top of the school, from the lowest form to the highest, that they in the middle may hear both lessons, may remember what they have learned, and perceive what they must come to. “I write unto you, fathers.” They that are of longest standing in Christ’s school have need of farther advice and instruction. The oldest disciple must go to heaven (the university above) with his book (his Bible) in his hand. Fathers must be written unto, preached unto; none too old to learn. He writes to them upon the account of their knowledge; “I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning,” ver. 13, 14. Old men have knowledge and experience, and expect deference thereupon. The apostle is ready to own the knowledge of old Christians, and to congratulate them thereupon. They know the Lord Christ particularly, “Him that was from the beginning,” as ch. i. 1. As Christ is Alpha and Omega, so he must be the beginning and end of our Christian knowledge; “I count all things but loss, for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord,” Phil. iii. 8. They that know him that was from the beginning, before this world was made, may well be induced thereby to relinquish this world. Then, thirdly, he speaks to the middle age of Christians, to those that are in their bloom and flower; “I write unto you, young men,” ver. 13, 14. They are the adult in Christ Jesus; those that are arrived to strength of spirit, and sound sense, can discern between good and evil. The apostle applies to them upon these accounts: 1st. Upon the account of their martial exploits. Dexterous soldiers they are in the camp of Christ; “Because ye have overcome the wicked one,” ver. 13. There is a wicked one that is continually warring against souls, and particularly against the disciples. But they that are grown [up to young men] in Christ’s school can handle their arms, and vanquish the evil one; and they that can vanquish him may be called to vanquish the world too, which is so great an instrument for the devil. 2nd. Upon the account of their strength, discovered in this their achievement; “Because ye are strong, and ye have overcome the wicked one,” ver. 14. Young men are wont to glory in their strength. It will be the glory of youthful persons to be strong in Christ, and in his grace; it will be their glory, and it will try their strength to overcome the devil. If they are not too hard for the devil, he will be too hard for them. Let vigorous Christians shew their strength in conquering the world; and the same strength must be exerted in overcoming this world as is employed in overcoming the devil.

3. Because of their acquaintance with the word of God; “And the word of God abideth in you,” ver. 14. The word of God must abide in the adult disciples; it is the nutriment and supply of strength to them; it is the weapon by which they overcome the wicked one; “The sword of the Spirit, whereby they quench his fiery darts.” And they in whom the word of God dwells are well furnished for the conquest of the world.

Secondly. We have the dehortation or dissuasion thus prefaced and introduced, a caution fundamental to vital, practical religion; “Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world,” ver. 15. Be crucified to the world; be mortified to the things, to the affairs and enticements of it. The several degrees of Christians should unite in this, in being dead to the world. Were they thus united, they would soon unite upon other accounts; the love should be reserved for God. Throw it not away upon the world. Now here we see the reasons of this dissuasion and caution; and they are several, and had need to be so; it is hard to dissuade disciples themselves from the love of the world. The first is taken from the inconsistency of this love with the love of God; “If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him,” ver. 15. The heart of man is narrow, and cannot contain both loves. The world draws down the heart from God; and so the more the love of the world prevails, the more the love of God dwindles and decays. The second is taken from the prohibition of worldly love or lust. It is not ordained of God; “It is not of the Father, but is of the world,” ver. 16. This love or lust is not appointed of God, he calls us from it; but it intrudes itself from the world. The world is a usurper of our affection. Now here we have the due consideration and notion of the world, according to which it is to be crucified and renounced. The world, physically considered, is good, and is to be admired as the work of God, and a glass in which his perfections shines. But it is to be considered in its relation to us now in our corrupted state, and as it works upon our weakness, and instigates and inflames our vile affections. There is great affinity and alliance between this world and the flesh; and this world intrudes and encroaches upon the flesh, and thereby makes a party against God. The things of the world, therefore, are distinguished into three classes, according to the three predominant inclinations of depraved nature. As,

1. There is “the lust of the flesh.” The flesh here, being distinguished from the eyes and the life, imports the body; the lust of the flesh is, subjectively, the humour and appetite of indulging fleshly pleasure; and, objectively, all those things that excite and inflame the pleasures of the flesh. This lust is usually called luxury.

2. There is “the lust of the eyes.” The eyes are delighted with treasures, to reject Christ, who is the light of the world, and so to abide in the darkness of sin and selfish isolation.

ii. 12. “Little children:” same word as in verse 1, but different from that in verse 13. Here it seems used as in verse 1, as a general term for all whom he addresses. These he proceeds to divide into three classes.

ii. 13. “The fathers, appropriately to their age, are characterised by knowledge; the young men, appropriately to theirs, by activity in conflict. The fathers, too, have conquered, but now their active service is past, and they and the children alike are characterised by knowing: the fathers know Christ, ‘him that was from the beginning; the children know the Father. The first thing that the little children realise is that God is their Father’ (“Critical and Explanatory Commentary”).

ii. 18. “See James v. 3; 1 Peter i. 20; Jude 18. These passages refer to the times since the coming of Christ, in which the power of Riches and rich possessions are craved by an extravagant eye. This is the lust of covetousness.

3. There is "the pride of life." A vain mind craves all the grandeur, equipage, and pomp of a vainglorious life. This is ambition and thirst after honour and applause; this is, in part, the disease of the ear. It must for rather will be flattered with admiration and praise. The objects of these appetites must be abandoned and renounced. As they engage and engross the affection and desire, "they are not of the Father, but of the world," ver. 16. The Father disallows them, and the world should keep them to itself. The lust and appetite to these things must be mortified and subdued. And so the indulging of it is not appointed by the Father, but is insinuated by the ensnaring world. The next argument is taken from the vain and vanishing state of earthly things, and the enjoyment of them: "And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof," ver. 17. The things of the world are fading and dying apace; the lust itself, and the pleasure of it, withers and decays. Desire itself will ere long fail and cease, Ecc. xii. 5; and what is become of all the pomp and pleasure of all those that now lie mouldering in the grave? The last reason is from the immortality of the Divine lover, the lover of God: "But he that doth the will of God," which must be the character of the lover of God, in opposition to this lover of the world, "abideth for ever," ver. 17. The object of his love, in opposition to the world that passeth away, "abideth for ever." His sacred passion or affection, in opposition to the lust that passeth away, "abideth for ever." Love shall never fail; and he himself is an heir of immortality and endless life, and shall in time be translated thither. From the whole of these verses we should observe the purity and spirituality of the apostolic doctrine. The animal life must be subjected to the Divine. The body, with its affections, should be subjugated to the soul, and should be swayed by religion, or the victorious love of God.

18 Little children, it is the last time: and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrists; whereby we know that it is the last time. 19 They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us: but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

Here is, First. A moral prognostication of the time. The end is coming; "Little children, it is the last time," ver. 18. Some may suppose that the apostle here addresses the first rank of Christians again. The juniors are most apt to be seduced; and therefore, "Little children," you that are young in religion, take heed to yourselves, that ye be not corrupted.

[Indeed, this seems to be the proper place for suggesting a somewhat different arrangement of the characters and counsels which occupy a considerable section of the epistle (from the 11th to the 28th verse) to that hitherto proceeded upon in the exposition. Part of our clue to more perfect accuracy on this point (by no means an immaterial or unpractical one) is found in the distinction between two words, which our translators have rendered alike. The first, occurring in ver. 12, and again in ver. 28, and repeatedly in other parts of the epistle, is properly a term of endearment, applicable, and plainly addressed, to all real Christians into whose hands the epistle comes: it should have been translated, 'my dear children,' that is, converts of the apostolic ministry, and in many cases, probably, of my own. But the other word in question, which is used in ver. 13 and 18, and in no other place, is strictly a designation of immature age; is pointed exclusively to babes in Christ; and is rightly rendered little, or young, children. 1. Now, in the beginning of the section, John summons to the hearing of his solemn message the whole body of the converts, affectionately challenging them by the first-mentioned epithet, 'dear children;' and declaring of them all, (what is true of all believers in all times, antecedently to any spiritual distinction between one and another,) that their sins are forgiven them for Christ's name's sake. May God help the reader to ponder the apostle's doctrine, and then to examine himself whether he be in the faith! 2. After this he proceeds to distinguish the believers into three classes, according to their comparative standing or attainments in the Christian life. He salutes them as fathers, young men, and little ones, or babes, in Christ. These severally he twice characterises; and, in two cases, adds pointed and appropriate counsels. (1.) The fathers, first, he congratulates on their mature, enlarged, and beatifying knowledge of Him that is from the beginning; who is thus by a single feature identified to us (according to St. John's constant manner,) as the incarnate and life-giving Word, (ch. i. 1, &c.) But, as if modestly forbearing, though himself a father, to offer them any advice peculiar to their class, he leaves them under the quickening impressions of his general message. (2.) Next, he distinguishes the young men, or considerably established converts, as strong, especially in the faith of Jesus; so cherishing the gospel word of God, by meditation and prayer, as to feel it abiding in them; and thus, much more easily than once they did, "overcoming the wicked one," in his assaults, by means of antichrist, on their evangelical confidence and peace. To this class, directly and particularly, he addresses the fatherly warnings which follow immediately after the repetition of their characteristics, ver. 15-17. Ye have overcome the devil, he says, in his own personally applied powers of mental temptation; now prepare for as perilous a trial from the world, the corrupt and corrupting world of sense without and around you. This is your present and peculiar danger; by such and such considerations guard against it. (3.) And thirdly, the venerable pastor portrays and encourages the little ones, that have but lately believed in Christ, yea, even the least and feeblest among them, as having "known the Father," as their Father by a Divine adoption; and again, (the above cautions to the young men being interposed,) as being, through their subsistence "in the Son," habitually in fellowship with the Father, and partakers of the unction of his Spirit; ver. 20, 24, 27. And Christians of this grade, by no means so experienced in the usual wiles of the devil with young believers, or so strong in their actual means of defence as Christians of the grade above them, are most appropriately cautioned and encouraged against antichrist; that is, against any teacher, or system, or even satanic suggestion to the mind, which would seduce them from their simple trust in Jesus as the Christ, the anointed Messiah and Saviour. The division into classes terminates at ver. 28, where the apostle again accosts Christians generally as dear children in the Lord.]

But it may be [used practically, here as well] as elsewhere, [in the way of] a universal appellation, introductory of an alarm to all Christians: "Little children, it is the last time." Our Jewish polity in church and state is hastening to an end. The Mosaic institution and discipline is just upon its vanishing away. Daniel's weeks are now expiring, the destruction of the Hebrew city and sanctuary approaching, "the end whereof must be with a flood," and to "the end of the war desolations are determined," Dan. ix. 26. It is meet that the disciples should be warned of the haste and end of time, and apprised, as much as may be, of the prophetic periods of time.

Secondly. The sign of this last time: "Even now there are many antichrists," ver. 18; many that oppose the person, and doctrine, and kingdom of Christ. It is a mysterious portion of providence that antichrist should be permitted. But when they are come, it is good and safe that the disciples should be informed of them. Ministers should be watchmen to the house of Israel. Now, it should be no great offence or prejudice to the disciples that there are such antichrists.

1. One great one has been foretold: "As ye have heard that antichrist shall come," ver. 18. The generality of the church have been informed by Divine revelation that there must be a long and fatal adversary to Christ and his church, 2 Thes. ii. 8-10. No wonder, then, there are many harbingers and forerunners of the great one. "Even now there are many antichrists." The mystery of iniquity already worketh.

2. They were foretold also as the sign of this last time; "For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders, inasmuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect," &c., Mat. xxiv. 24. And these were the forerunners of the dissolution of the Jewish state, nation, and religion, whereby we know "it is the last time," ver. 18. Let the prediction that we see there has been of seducers arising in the Christian world fortify us against their seduction.

Thirdly. Some account of these seducers or antichrists.

1. More positively. They were once entertainers or professors of apostolical doctrine: "They went out from us," ver. 19, from our company and communion; possibly, from the church of Jerusalem, or some of the churches of Judæa; as Acts xv. 1, "Certain men came down from Judæa, and taught the brethren," &c. The purest churches may have their apostates and revolvers. The apostolical doctrine did not convert all whom it convinced of its truth.

2. More privately. They were not inwardly such as we are: "But they were not of us;" they had not from the heart obeyed the form of sound doctrine delivered to them. They were not of our union with Christ the Head. Then here is, 1st. The reason upon which it is concluded that they were not of us, were not what they pretended, or what we are, and that is their actual defection: "For if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us," ver. 19. Had the sacred truth been rooted in their hearts, it would have held them with us. Had they had the anointing from above, (by which they had [would have] been made true and real Christians,) they had not turned antichrists. They that apostatize from religion sufficiently indicate that, before, they were hypocrites in religion. They that have imbibed the spirit of gospel truth have a good preservative against destructive error. 2nd. The reason why they are permitted thus to depart from apostolical doctrine and communion,—that their insincerity may be detected. But this was done, or they went out, "that they may be made manifest that they were not all of us," ver. 19. The church knows not well who are its vital members, and who are not. And, therefore, the church, considered as internally sanctified, may well be styled invisible. Some of the hypocritical must be manifested here, and that for their own shame and benefit too,—in their reduction to the truth, if they have not sinned unto death,—and for the terror and caution of others; "Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware, lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace," &c. 2 Pet. iii. 17, 18.

20 But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things. 21 I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth. 22 Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son. 23 Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: [but] he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also. 24 Let that therefore abide in you, which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father. 25 And this is the promise that he hath promised us, even eternal life. 26 These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you. 27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you: but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him.

Here, First. The apostle encourages the disciples (to whom he writes) in these dangerous times, in this hour of seducers; he encourages them in the assurance of their stability in this day of apostasy: "But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things." We see,

1. The blessing wherewith they were enriched. An unguent from heaven; "Ye have an unction." True Christians are anointed ones; their name intimates as much. They are anointed with the oil of grace; with gifts and spiritual endowments, by the Spirit of grace. They are anointed into a similitude of their Lord's offices, as subordinate prophets, priests, and kings unto God. The Holy Spirit is compared unto oil, as well as to fire or water; and the communication of his saving grace is our anointing.

2. From whom this blessing comes: "From the Holy One;" either from the Holy Ghost, or from the Lord Christ, as Rev. iii. 7, "These things saith he that is holy." "The Holy One." The Lord Christ is glorious in his holiness. The Lord Christ disposes of the graces of the Divine Spirit, and he anoints the disciples to make them like to himself, and to secure them in his interest.

ii. 20. "Ye have an unction from the Holy One;" allusion to the consecration of kings, priests, and prophets with oil. There is an emphasis on "ye." "Ye," as contrasted with the antichrists. "Ye have the chrism (i.e., an anointing with the Holy Spirit) from Christ (the 'Anointed One'), and so are able to detect and resist the antichrists."

ii. 24. "Let that," &c. : i.e., the truth respecting the Father and the Son.

the world is in part broken, but will be wholly destroyed only at his second advent" (Webster and Wilkinson). "Antichrist;" the word "anti" may mean either "against" or "in the stead of." According to the meaning we give it, will the antichrist be one who opposes or merely usurps Christ's place. St. John (who is the only New Testament writer who uses the word antichrist) seems to use it in the former sense, for one who manifests resistance to Christ and defies his authority.

3. The effect of this unction. It is a spiritual eye-salve; it enlightens and strengthens the eyes of the understanding. "And," thereby, "ye know all things," ver. 20. All these things concerning Christ and his religion. It was promised and given you for that end, Jno. xiv. 25. [He becomes your Anointed, to enable you to know him as God's Anointed.] The Lord Christ does not deal alike by all his professed disciples. Some are more anointed than others. There is great danger lest those that are not thus anointed should be so far from being true to Christ, as that they should on the contrary turn antichrists, and prove adversaries to Christ's person, and kingdom, and glory.

Secondly. The apostle indicates to them the mind and meaning with which he wrote to them.

1. By way of negation. Not as suspecting their knowledge, or supposing their ignorance in the grand truths of the Gospel; "I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth," ver. 21. I could not then be so well assured of your stability therein, nor congratulate your unction from above. It is good to surmise well concerning our Christian brethren; we ought to do so till evidence overthrows our surmise. A just confidence in religious persons may both encourage and contribute to their fidelity.

2. By way of assertion and acknowledgment. As relying upon their judgment in these things; "But because ye know it," (ye know the truth in Jesus,) "and that no lie is of the truth." They that know the truth in any kind are thereby prepared to discern what is contrary thereto, and inconsistent therewith. Rectum est index sui et obliqui.—Truth reveals both itself and whatever is opposed to it. Truth and falsehood do not well mix and suit together. They that are well acquainted with Christian truth are thereby well fortified against antichristian error and delusion. No lie belongs to religion, either natural or revealed. The apostles most of all condemned lies, and shew the inconsistency of lies with their doctrine. They would be the most self-condemned persons, should they propagate the truth by lies. It is a commendation of the Christian religion that it so well accords with natural religion, which is the foundation of it; that it well accords with the Jewish religion, which contained the elements or rudiments of it. "No lie is of the truth." Frauds and impostures, then, are very unfit means to support and propagate the truth. I suppose it had been better with the state of religion if they had never been used. The result of them appears in the infidelity of our age. The detection of ancient pious frauds and wiles has almost run our age into atheism and irreligion. But the greatest actors and sufferers for the Christian revelation would assure us that "no lie is of the truth."

Thirdly. The apostle farther impleads and arraigns these seducers that were newly arisen.

1. They are liars, egregious opposers of sacred truth. "Who is a liar" (or the liar, the notorious liar of the time and age in which we live) "but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?" The great and pernicious lies that the father of lies (or of liars) spreads in the world were of old, and usually are, falsehoods and errors relating to the person of Christ. There is no truth so sacred and fully attested but some or other will contradict or deny it. That Jesus of Nazareth was the Son and the Christ of God had been attested by heaven, and earth, and hell. It should seem that some in the tremendous judgment of God are given up to strong delusions.

2. They are direct enemies to God, as well as to the Lord Christ; "He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son," ver. 22. He that opposes Christ denies the witness and testimony of the Father, and the seal that he hath given to his Son; "For him hath God the Father sealed," Jno. vi. 27. And he that denies the witness and testimony of the Father concerning Jesus Christ, denies that God is the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ; and, consequently, abandons the knowledge of God in Christ; and, thereupon, the whole revelation of God in Christ, and particularly of God in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.

[In truth, the full emphasis of the statement, the liar, or antichrist, is "he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ," or, otherwise speaking, "that denieth the Father and" or in, "the Son"—can only be felt by referring to some explanations already given. St. John rarely presents in one passage a perfect view of Christ's unique and glorious character; he scatters its parts and elements, as in a dissected map, throughout the whole epistle. But, when put together in proper adjustment, they shew that his object is to teach and maintain, not simply the divinity or Divine Sonship, nor yet the real humanity, of Christ, but the mediation of this God-man with the Father, and our acceptance and right to eternal life solely through his propitiatory sacrifice. This is true Christianity. Christ is the exponent of the whole gospel system. Antichrist, therefore, is the system, or the teacher, (and of each the name is Legion,) that sets up any thing whatever, either against, or in place of, Emmanuel as the appointed Saviour. This is the sting and venom of the denial of the Father as in the Son, of Jesus as the Christ, of Jesus Christ as having come in the flesh, (ch. iv. 3), and the like. No spirit confesseth Jesus "Christ who is come in the flesh," (for so should that passage run,) which would either supersede or assist him by its false suggestions in that work of "saving sinners," for the doing of which he came. Not merely anti-trinitarianism, as some would have us believe, but all anti-evangelism, and pre-eminently Popery under all its modifications, is antichrist, and a lie.]

And, therefore, the apostle may well infer, "Whosoever denies the Son, the same hath not the Father," ver. 23. He hath not the true knowledge of the Father; for the Son hath most and best revealed him. He hath no interest in the Father; in his favour, and grace, and salvation; "For none cometh to the Father but by the Son." But (as some copies add) he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also," ver. 23. As there is an intimate relation between the Father and the Son, so there is an inviolable union in the doctrine, knowledge, and interests of them both; so that he that hath the knowledge of, and right to the Son, hath the knowledge of, and right to the Father also. They that adhere to the Christian revelation hold the light and benefit of natural religion withal.

Fourthly. Hereupon the apostle adviseth and persuadeth the disciples to continue in the old doctrine at first communicated to them; "Let that, therefore, abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning," ver. 24. Truth is older than error. The truth concerning Christ, that was at first delivered to the saints, is not to be exchanged for novelties. So sure were the apostles of the truth of what they had delivered concerning Christ, and from him, that, after all their toils and sufferings, they were not willing to relinquish it. The Christian truth may plead antiquity, and be recommended thereby. This exhortation is enforced by these considerations:—

1. From the sacred advantage they will receive by adhering to the primitive truth and faith. 1st. They will continue thereby in holy union with God and Christ. "If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son, and in the Father," ver. 24. It is the truth of Christ abiding in you is the means of severing us from sin, and uniting us to the Son of God, Jno. xv. 3, 4. It is the Son is the medium, or Mediator, by whom we are united to the Father. What value, then, should we put upon gospel truth! 2nd. They will thereby secure the promise of eternal life; "And this is the promise that he" (even God the Father, ch. v. 11), "hath promised us, even eternal life," ver. 25. Great is the promise that God makes to his faithful adherents; it is suitable to his own greatness, power, and goodness; it is eternal life, which none but God can give. It is great value that the blessed God puts upon his Son, and the truth relating to him, that he is pleased to promise to those that continue in that truth, (that is, under the light, and power, and influence of it,) eternal life. Then the exhortation afore-said is enforced.

2. From the design of the apostle's writing to them. This letter is to fortify them against the deceivers of the age; "These things have I written to you concerning them that seduce you," ver. 26; and, therefore, if ye continue not in what you have heard from the beginning, my writing and service will be in vain. We should beware lest the apostolical letters, yea, lest the whole Scripture of God, should be to us insignificant and fruitless. "I have written to him the great things of my law," (and my Gospel too,) "but they were counted as a strange thing," Hos. viii. 12.

3. From the instructive blessing they had received from heaven: "But the anointing which ye have received from him abideth in you," ver. 27. True Christians have an inward confirmation of the Divine truth they have imbibed. The Holy Spirit has imprinted it on their minds and hearts. It is meet the Lord Jesus should have a constant witness in the hearts of his disciples. The unction, the pouring out of the gifts of grace upon sincere disciples, is a seal to the truth and doctrine of Christ, since none giveth that seal but God; "Now he who stablisheth us with you" (and you with us) "in Christ, and hath anointed us, is God," 2 Cor. i. 21. This sacred chrism, or Divine unction, is commended on these accounts: 1st. It is durable and lasting. Oil or unguent is not so soon dried up as water; "It abideth in you," ver. 27. Divine illumination, in order to confirmation, must be something continued or constant. Temptations, snares, and seductions arise; the anointing must abide. 2nd. It is better than human instruction; "And ye need not that any man teach you," ver. 27. Not that this anointing will teach you without the appointed ministry; it could, if God so pleased, but it will not, but will teach you better than we can; "And ye need not that any man teach you," ver. 27. Ye were instructed by us before ye were anointed; but now our teaching is nothing in comparison to that. "Who teacheth like him?" Job xxxvi. 22. The Divine unction does not supersede ministerial teaching, but surmount it. 3rd. It is a sure evidence of truth; and all that it teacheth is infallible truth; "But as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie," ver. 27. The Holy Spirit must needs be the Spirit of truth, as he is called, Jno. xiv. 17. The instruction and illumination that he affords must needs be in and of the truth. The Spirit of truth will not lie. And he teacheth all things, that is, all things in the present dispensation; all things necessary to our knowledge of God in Christ, and their glory in the Gospel. And, 4th. It is of a conservative influence; it will preserve those in whom it abides against seducers and their seduction; "And even as it hath taught you ye shall abide in him," ver. 27. It teaches you to abide in Christ; and, as it teaches you, it secures you. It lays a restraint upon your minds and hearts, that you may not revolt from him; "And hath anointed us, is God; who also hath sealed us," (for himself,) "and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts," 2 Cor. i. 21, 22.

28 And now, little children, abide in him; that, when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming. 29 If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him.

From the blessing of the sacred unction the apostle proceeds in his advice and exhortation to constancy in and with Christ; "And now, little children, abide in him," ver. 28. The apostle repeats his kind appellation, "little children," which, I suppose, does not so much denote the diminitiveness of them as the affection of him; and therefore, I judge, may be rendered, 'dear children.' He would persuade by love, and prevail by endearment, as well as by reason. [And he seems to glide back from a particular admonition into the general discourse in this manner:—What I have just said to babes in Christ, I am thus reminded to urge on you all, as the sum of your duty and your blessedness,—dear children, abide in him.] Not only the love of Christ, but the love of you constrains us to inculcate your perseverance, and that "you would abide in him," in the truth relating to his person, and in your union with him, and allegiance to him. Evangelical privileges are obligatory to evangelical duties. And they that are anointed by the Lord Jesus are highly obliged to abide with him in opposition to all adversaries whatever. And this duty of perseverance and constancy in trying times is strongly urged by two following considerations.

First. From the consideration of his return at the great day of account; "That when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming," ver. 28. It is here taken for granted that the Lord Jesus will come again. This was part of that truth they had heard from the beginning. And when he comes again, he will publicly appear, be manifested to all. When he was here before he came privately, in comparison; he proceeded from a womb, and was introduced into a stable; but when he comes again he will come from the opened heavens, and every eye shall see him; and then they that have continued with him throughout all their temptations shall have confidence, assurance, and joy in the sight of him. They shall lift up their heads with unspeakable triumph, as knowing that their complete redemption comes along with him. On the contrary, they that have deserted him shall "be ashamed before him;" they shall be ashamed of themselves, ashamed of their unbelief, their cowardice, ingratitude, temerity, and folly in forsaking so glorious a Redeemer. They shall be ashamed of their hopes, expectations, and pretences, and ashamed of all the wages of unrighteousness, by which they were induced to desert him; "That we may have confidence, and we may not be ashamed." The apostle includes himself in the number. Let not us be ashamed of you, as well as, you will not be ashamed of yourselves. Or (μη αισχυνησιντες υμιν αλληλους) 'that we be not ashamed;' that is, made ashamed, or put to shame, "by him at his coming." At his public appearance he will shame all those that have abandoned him; he will disclaim all acquaintance with them; will cover them with shame and confusion; will abandon them to darkness, devils, and endless despair, by professing before men and angels that he is ashamed of them, Mar. viii. 38. Now to the same advice and exhortation, he proceeds.

Secondly. From the consideration of the dignity of those that still adhere to Christ and his religion. "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is born of him," ver. 29. The particle here rendered "if," seems not to be vox dubitantis, but concedentis; not so much a conditional particle as a suppositional one, if I may call it so, a note of allowance or concession, and so seems to be of the same import with our English 'inasmuch,' or 'whereas,' or 'since.' So the sense runs more clear. "Since ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness is

ii. 27. The possession of the chrism was a proof that they remained in the truth. The fulfilment of the promise of the "paraclete" (John xiv. 26) rendered it unnecessary for them to go in search of any extraneous teacher.

ii. 28. "Little children:" same word as in verses 12, &c., and referring to believers of all ages. "Abide in him:" compare John xv. 4. "Not be ashamed:" not shrink back with shame from him.

ii. 29. To be joined rather with next chapter. "God is righteous, and therefore the source of righteousness. When, then, a man doeth righteousness, we know that the source of his righteousness is God; that, consequently, he has acquired by new birth from God that righteousness which he had not by nature. We argue from his doing righteousness, to his being born of God. The error of Pelagians is to conclude that doing righteousness is a condition of becoming a child of God" (Alford).

iii. 1. St. John had spoken, in chap. ii. 29, of a godly life as the born of him." "He that doth righteousness may here be justly enough assumed as another name for him that abideth in Christ; for he that abideth in Christ abideth in the law and love of Christ, and, consequently, in his allegiance and obedience to him; and so must do, or work, or practise righteousness, or the parts of gospel holiness. Now, such a one must needs be born of him. He is renewed by the Spirit of Christ, after the image of Christ; "Created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath foreordained that they should walk in them," Eph. ii. 10. Since, then, you know that the Lord Christ is righteous, righteous in his quality and capacity, the Lord our righteousness, and the Lord our Sanctifier, or our sanctification, as 1 Cor. i. 30, [or, more generally, since you know that "the Lord our God is holy,"] ye cannot but know thereupon (or know ye, it is for your consideration and regard) that he that (by the continued practice of Christianity) abideth in him, is "born of him." The new spiritual nature is derived from the Lord Christ. He that is constant to the practice of religion in trying times gives good evidence that he is born from above, from the Lord Christ. The Lord Christ is an everlasting Father. It is a great privilege and dignity to be "born of him;" [or begotten, relatively by adoption, and personally by a change of nature, most usually termed regeneration. "Every one that doeth righteousness" proves himself to be a partaker of both: but the reference in this present connexion is chiefly to the latter.] They that are so are the children of God; "To as many as received him, to them gave he power" [that is, as Mediator, secured to them the privilege] "to become the sons of God," 1 Jo. i. 12. [And, after all that has been remarked above, it is proper we should understand that it is of God, and not personally of the Lord Christ, that believing and holy men are said to be the begotten sons. We must not always be guided in John's epistles by the immediate antecedent. It is the Father, properly speaking, that adopts unto himself those whom the Son, on his part, hath redeemed, (Eph. i. 5; Gal. iv. 3), and that regenerates them in the moral likeness of the Godhead by the agency of the Holy Ghost.] And this introduces the context of the following chapter.

CHAPTER III.

The apostle here magnifies the love of God in our adoption, ver. 1, 2; he thereupon argues for holiness, ver. 3; and against sin, ver. 4—10; he presseth brotherly love, ver. 11—18; how to assure our hearts before God, ver. 19—22; the precept of faith, ver. 23; and the good of obedience, ver. 24.

BEHOLD, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not. 2 Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. 3 And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

The apostle, having shewn the dignity of Christ's faithful followers, that they are born of him, and thereby nearly allied to God, now here,

First. Breaks forth into the admiration of that grace that is the spring of such a wonderful vouchsafement. "Behold" (see ye, observe) "what manner of love" (or how great love) "the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called" (effectually called; he that calls things that are not makes them to be what they were not) "the sons of God." The Father adopts all the children of the Son. The Son indeed calls them, and makes them his brethren, and thereby he confers upon them the power and dignity of the sons of God. It is wonderful condescending love of the eternal Father, that such as we should be made and called his sons; we, that by nature are heirs of sin, and guilt, and the curse of God. We, that by practice are children of corruption, disobedience, and ingratitude. Strange that the holy God is not ashamed to be called our Father, and to call us his sons. [Note, That his love is as much shewn in calling us to bear some image of his holiness, as in conferring upon us the privileges of adoption, Eph. i. 3—5. God's manner of loving and blessing us, which is by making us holy, should guide our own desires.] Thence the apostle,

Secondly. Infers the honour of believers above the cognizance of the world. Unbelievers know little of them; "Therefore" (or wherefore, upon this score) "the world knoweth us not," ver. 1. Little does the world perceive the advancement and happiness of the genuine followers of Christ. They are here exposed to the common calamities of earth and time; all things fall alike to them as to others, unless they are subject to the greater sorrows; for they have often reason to say, "If in this life only we had hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19. The unchristian world, therefore, that walks by sight, knows not their dignity, their privileges, the enjoyments they have in hand, or what they are entitled to. Little does the world think that these poor, humble, condemned ones are the favourites of heaven, and will be inhabitants there ere long. And they may bear their case the better, since their Lord was here unknown, as well as they; "Because it knew him not," ver. 1. [It did not recognize God in his own Son incarnate; how should it appreciate or love his image in his adopted, earthly, and erring children?] Little did the world think how great a person was once sojourning here—that the Maker of it was once an inhabitant of it. Little did the Jewish world think that the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, was one of their blood, and dwelt in their land. He came to his own, and his own received him not; he came to his own, and his own crucified him. But surely, had they known him, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory, 2 Cor. ii. 8. Let the followers of Christ be content with hard fare here, since they are in a land of strangers, among those that little know them, and their Lord was so treated before them. Then the apostle, Thirdly. Exalts these persevering disciples in the prospect of the certain revelation of their state and dignity. Where,

1. Their present honourable relation is asserted; "Beloved," (ye may well be fruit and proof of spiritual birth; he now calls attention, as to something wonderful ("Behold"), to the fact of God's claiming us as his children. Thus this verse is connected with chap. ii. 29. "Remember always that this relation is one between God and your spirits; hidden, therefore, from the world; not to be recognised by those who see with the world's eyes" (Maurice). Compare John xvi. 3, xvii. 25.

2. "Doth not yet appear:" rather, "it hath not yet (at any our beloved, for ye are beloved of God,) "now are we the sons of God," ver. 2. We have the nature of sons by regeneration; we have the title, and [attesting] Spirit, and right to the inheritance of sons by adoption. [Rom. xv. 15—17] "This honour have all his saints."

2. The discovery of the bliss belonging and suitable to this relation is denied "And it doth not yet appear what we shall be," ver. 2. The glory pertaining to the sonship and adoption is adjoined and reserved for another world. The discovery of it here would put a stop to the current of affairs, that must now proceed. The sons of God must walk by faith, and live by hope.

3. The time of the revelation of the sons of God in their proper state and glory is determined; and that is when their Elder Brother comes to call and collect them all together. "But we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him." That the particle εἰ, usually translated "if," is here well rendered "when," may appear, not only because the Hebrew particle (to which this is thought to correspond) is observed so to signify, (as Dr. Whitby has here noted,) and not only is εἰ sometimes used for ὅταν, but some copies even here read ὅταν; "when;" and, accordingly, it seems proper so to render it in 1 Jo. xiv. 3, where we read it, "And if I go and prepare a place, (but more naturally and properly, "when I shall have gone, and shall have prepared the place,") "I will come again and receive you unto myself," (or, παράλθωμαι, "I will take you along with myself,") "that where I am there ye may be also." When the Head of the church, the only begotten of the Father, shall appear, his members, the adopted of God, shall appear and be manifested together with him. They may, then, well wait, in faith, hope, and earnest desire, for the revelation of the Lord Jesus, as even the creation itself waiteth for their perfection, and the public "manifestation of the sons of God," Rom. viii. 19. The sons of God will be known and be made manifest by their likeness to their Head; "They shall be like him," like him in honour, and power, and glory. Their vile bodies shall be made like his glorious body; they shall be filled with life, light, and bliss from him; "When he who is their life shall appear, they also shall appear with him in glory," Col. iii. 4. Then,

4. Their likeness to him is argued from the sight they shall have of him; "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Either their likeness will be the cause of that sight they shall have of him,—indeed, all shall see him, but not as they do, not as he is, namely, to those in heaven. They shall see him in his frowns, in the terror of his majesty, and splendour of his avenging perfections. But these shall see him in the smiles and beauty of his face, in the correspondence and amiableness of his glory, in the harmony and agreeableness of his beatific perfections. Their likeness shall enable them to see him, as the blessed do in heaven,—or, the sight of him shall be the cause of their likeness. It shall be a transformative sight; they shall be transformed into the same image by the beatific view that they shall have of him. Then the apostle, Fourthly. Urges the engagement of these sons of God to the prosecution of holiness; "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure," ver. 3. The sons of God know that their Lord is holy and pure; he is of purer heart and eyes than to admit any pollution or impurity to dwell with him. They, then, that hope to live with him must study utmost purity from the world, and flesh, and sin; they must grow in grace and holiness. Not only does their Lord command them to do so, but their new nature inclines them so to do; yea, their hope of heaven will dictate and constrain them so to do. They know their High Priest is holy, harmless, and undefiled. They know that their God and Father is the High and Holy One; that all the society is pure and holy; that their inheritance is an inheritance of saints in light. It is a contradiction to such hope to indulge sin and impurity; and therefore, as we are sanctified by faith, we must be sanctified by hope; that we may be saved by hope, we must be purified by hope. It is the hope of hypocrites, and not of the sons of God, that makes an allowance for the gratification of impure desires and lusts.

4 Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law: for sin is the transgression of the law. 5 And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins; and in him is no sin. 6 Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not: whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him. 7 Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. 8 He that committeth sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. 9 Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. 10 In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother.

The apostle, having alleged the believer's obligation to purity, from his hope of heaven, and of communion with Christ in glory, at the day of his appearance, now proceeds to fill his own mouth and the believer's mind with multiplied arguments against sin, and all communion with the impure, unfruitful works of darkness. And so he reasons and argues,

First. From the nature of sin, and the intrinsic evil of it. It is a contrariety to the Divine law; "Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth also" (or even) "the law;" (or whosoever committeth sin, even committeth enormity, or aberration from law, or from the law;) "for sin is the transgression of the law," (or is lawlessness,) ver. 4. Sin is the destitution or privation of correspondence and agreement with the Divine law; that law that is the transcript of the Divine nature and purity; that contains his will for the government of the world; that is suitable to the rational nature, and enacted for the good of the world; that shews man the way of felicity and peace, and conducts him to the Author of his nature and of the law. The current commission of sin now time) been manifested." "When he shall appear:" rather, "If it be manifested, we shall be like him (God)."

iii. 4. "Whosoever," &c.: rather, "every one who," in contrast to verse 3. "Transgresseth also the law:" i.e., God's law of purity, thereby showing that he has no hope of being hereafter pure, as God is pure, and therefore that he is not born of God. "He was manifested:" see verse 8.

iii. 9, 10. "What he says here—what he is bound to say, unless is the rejection of the Divine law, and that is the rejection of the Divine authority, and consequently of God himself.

Secondly. From the design and errand of the Lord Jesus in and to this world, which was to remove sin; "And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sins, and in him is no sin," ver. 5. The Son of God appeared and was known in our nature; and he came to vindicate and exalt the Divine law, and that by obedience to the precept, and by subjection, and suffering under the penal sanction, under the curse of it. He came, therefore, "to take away our sins;" to take away the guilt of them by the sacrifice of himself; to take away the commission of them by implanting a new nature in us, for we are sanctified by virtue of his death; and to dissuade and save from it by his own example. "And" (or for) "in him was no sin," or he takes sin away, that he might conform us to himself; "and in him is no sin." They that expect communion with Christ above should study communion with him here in utmost purity. And the Christian world should know and consider the great end of the Son of God's coming hither. It was to take away our sin; "And ye know" (and this knowledge should be deep and effectual) "that he was manifested to take away our sins."

Thirdly. From the opposition between sin and a real union with, or adhesion unto, the Lord Christ; "Whosoever abideth in him sinneth not," ver. 6. To sin here is the same as to commit sin, ver. 8, 9, and to commit sin is to practise sin. He that abideth in Christ continues not in the practise of sin. As vital union with the Lord Jesus broke the power of sin in the heart and nature, so continuance therein prevents the rule and prevalence thereof in the life and conduct. Or the negative expression here is put for the positive. He "sinneth not," that is, he is obedient, "he keeps the commandments," (in sincerity, and in the ordinary course of life,) "and does those things that are pleasing in his sight," as is said, ver. 22. They that abide in Christ abide in their covenant with him, and consequently watch against the sin that is contrary thereto. They abide in the potent light and knowledge of him, and therefore it may be concluded that he that sinneth (abideth in the predominant practice of sin) "hath not seen him," (hath not his mind impressed with a sound, evangelical discerning of him,) "neither known him" (hath no experimental acquaintance with him.) Practical renunciation of sin is the great evidence of spiritual union with, continuance in, and saving knowledge of, the Lord Christ.

Fourthly. From the connexion between the practice of righteousness and a state of righteousness, intimating withal, that the practice of sin and a justified state are inconsistent; and this is introduced with a supposition that a surmise to the contrary is a gross deceit: "Little children," (dear children, and, as much children as ye are, herein,) "let no man deceive ye." There will be those that will magnify your new light and entertainment of Christianity; that will make you believe that your knowledge, profession, and baptism, will excuse you the care and accuracy of the Christian life. But beware of such self-deceit. "He that does righteousness is righteous." It may appear that righteousness may in several places of Scripture be justly rendered religion, as Mat. v. 10, "Blessed are they that are persecuted for righteousness' sake," that is, for religion's sake. And, 1 Pet. iii. 14, "But if ye suffer for righteousness' sake," (that is, religion's sake,) "happy are ye." And so 2 Tim. iii. 16, "All Scripture" (or the whole Scripture) "is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, and for instruction in righteousness," that is, in the nature and branches of religion. To do righteousness, then, (especially being set in opposition to the doing, committing, or practising of sin,) is to practise religion. Now, he that practiseth religion is righteous; he is the righteous person on all accounts; he is sincere and upright before God. The practice of religion cannot subsist without a principle of integrity and conscience. He has that righteousness that consists in pardon of sin and right to life, founded upon the imputation of the Mediator's righteousness. He has a title to "the crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge will give" (according to his covenant and promise) "to those that love his appearing," 2 Tim. iv. 8. He has communion with Christ in conformity to the Divine law, being, in some measure, practically righteous as he; and has communion with him in the justified state, being now relatively righteous together with him. [But the former, practical or personal righteousness, is meant here. No man, whatever his pretensions to an imputed righteousness, can be accepted as a righteous man, unless, through grace, he habitually doeth righteousness.]

Fifthly. From the relation between the sinner and the devil; and thereupon from the design and office of the Lord Christ towards the devil.

1. From the relation between the sinner and the devil. As elsewhere sinners and saints are famously distinguished, though even saints are sinners, largely so called—so, to commit sin, is here so to practise it as sinners do that are distinguished from saints—to live under the power and dominion of it. And he that does so "is of the devil;" his sinful nature is inspired by, agreeable and pleasing to, the devil; and he belongs to the party, and interest, and kingdom of the devil. It is he that is the author and patron of sin, and has been a practitioner of it, a tempter and instigator to it, even from the beginning of the world. And thereupon we must see how he argues,

2. From the design and office of the Lord Christ against the devil: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil," ver. 8. The devil has designed and endeavoured to ruin the work of God in this world. The Son of God hath undertaken the holy war against him. He came into our world, and was manifested in our flesh, that he might conquer him and dissolve his work. Sin will he loosen and dissolve more and more, till he has quite destroyed it. Let not us serve or indulge what the Son of God came to destroy.

Sixthly. From the connexion between regeneration and the relinquishment of sin; "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin." To be born (or, begotten) of God is to be inwardly renewed and restored to a holy integrity or rectitude of nature, by the power of the Spirit of God. Such a one committeth not sin, does not work iniquity and practise disobedience; that is, contrary to his new nature and the regenerate complexion of his Spirit. "For," (as the apostle adds,) "his seed remaineth in him;" either the word of God (in its light and power) remaineth in him, as 1 Pet. i. 23, "Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, who liveth and abideth for ever;" or, "that which is born of the Spirit is spirit;" the spiritual seminal principle of holiness remaineth in him. Renewing grace is an abiding principle. Religion (in the spring of it) is not an art, an acquired dexterity and skill, but a new nature. And thereupon the consequence is, the regenerate person cannot sin. That he cannot commit an act of sin, I suppose, no judicious interpreter understands. That would be contrary to 1 J. i. 9, where it is made our duty to confess our sins, and supposed our privilege thereupon to have our sins forgiven. He, therefore, "cannot sin," in the sense [in which] the apostle says he "cannot" commit sin. He cannot continue in the course and practice of sin. He cannot so sin as to denominate him a sinner, in opposition to a saint or servant of God. Again, he cannot sin comparatively, as he did before he was born of God, and as others do that are not so. And the reason is, "because he is born of God," which will amount to all this inhibition and impediment. 1. There is that light in his mind that shews him the evil and malignity of sin. 2. There is that bias upon his heart that disposes him to loathe and hate sin. 3. There is the spiritual, seminal principle or disposition, that breaks the force and fulness of the sinful acts. They proceed not from that plenary power of corruption, as they do in others, nor obtain that plenitude of heart, spirit, and consent, as they do in others. "The Spirit lusteth against the flesh;" and therefore in respect to such sin it may be said, It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. It is not reckoned the person's sin in the gospel account, [so as to expose him to the condemnation of a wilful transgressor,] where the bent and frame of the mind and spirit is against it. Then, 4. There is a disposition for humiliation and repentance for sin, when it has been committed; "He that is born of God cannot sin. Here we may call to mind the usual distinction of natural and moral impotency. The unregenerate person is morally unable for what is religiously good. The regenerate person is (happily) disabled for sin. There is a restraint, an embargo (as we may say) laid upon his sinning powers. It goes against him sedately and deliberately to sin. We usually say of a person of known integrity, he cannot lie, he cannot cheat, and commit other enormities. "How can I commit this great wickedness, and sin against God," Gen. xxxix. 9; and so, they that persist in sinful life sufficiently demonstrate that they are not born of God.

Seventhly. From the discrimination between the children of God and the children of the devil. They have their distinct characters. "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil," ver. 10. In the world (according to the old distinction) there is the seed of God, and the seed of the serpent. Now the seed of the serpent is known by these two signatures: 1. By neglect of religion; "Whosoever doeth not righteousness" (omits and disregards the rights and dues of God; for religion is but our righteousness towards God, or giving him his due; and whosoever does not conscientiously do this) "is not of God," but, on the contrary, of the devil. The devil is the father of unrighteous or irreligious souls. And, 2. By hatred of fellow-Christians; "Neither he that loveth not his brother," ver. 10. True Christians are to be loved for God's and Christ's sake. They that so love them not (but despise, and hate, and persecute them) have the serpentine nature still abiding in them.

[Loveth not his brother. Any one, that is, who would be his Christian brother, supposing that he himself was what he professes to be,—a child of God. For it is the professor that is here compelled to the test of a special and spiritual love. But his disinclination to own any consistent Christian as a brother, or his entire want of complacency in, and congeniality with, him, invalidates that very supposition. He himself cannot belong to the brotherhood. No semblance of family features is to be trusted, in the total absence of family feelings. He that is practically ungodly is not more manifestly unbegotten of God than he who, pretending to godliness, recoils from God's likeness in another. Godliness and brotherly kindness have one and the same seminal principle, (2 Pet. i. 7;) and, as the collocation in this 10th verse implies, so likewise have their contraries.]

11 For this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another. 12 Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous. 13 Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

The apostle, having intimated that one note of the devil's children is hatred of the brethren, takes occasion thence,

First. To recommend fraternal Christian love, and that from the excellence, or antiquity, or primariness of the injunction relating thereto. And "this is the message" (the errand or charge) "which ye heard from the beginning," (this came among the principal parts of practical Christianity,) "that we should love one another," ver. 11. We should love the Lord Jesus, and value his love, and consequently love all the objects of it, and thereupon all our brethren in Christ. [Nay, and from the beginning of the world, and of God's moral government in it, the principle of mutual love was made binding on all mankind. The reference to Cain suggests this larger view.]

Secondly. To dissuade from what is contrary thereto, all ill-will towards the brethren, and that by the example of Cain. His envy and malignity should deter us from harbouring the like passion, and that upon these accounts. 1. It shewed that he was as the firstborn of the serpent's seed, even he, the eldest son of the first man, was of the "wicked one." He imitated and resembled the first wicked one, the devil. 2. His ill-will had no restraint; it proceeded so far as to contrive and accomplish murder, and that of a near relation, and that in the beginning of the world, when there were but few to replenish it. "He slew his brother," ver. 12. Sin indulged knows no bounds. And, 3. It proceeded so far, and had so much of the devil, that he murdered his brother for religion's sake. He stomachs the meliority [resented the superiority] of Abel's service, and envied him the favour and acceptance he had with God. And for these he martyred his brother. "And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous," ver. 12. Ill-will will teach us to hate and revenge what we should admire and imitate. [But we see this connection between the two symptoms of unregeneracy, namely, an unholiness conversation and an unloving spirit, (ver. 10,) illustrated in many milder forms. To mention one of the mildest,—the dislike and avoidance of Christian men of one class, on the part of some Christian professors of another, arise simply from a distaste for true piety and devotedness, and from the consciousness in their own case of much worldliness of mind and life.] And then,

Thirdly. To infer that it is no wonder, then, that good men are so served now; "Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you," ver. 13. The serpentine nature still continues in the world. The great serpent himself reigns as the god of this world. Wonder not, then, that the serpentine world hates and hisses at you that belong to that seed of the woman that is to bruise the serpent's head.

14 We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death. 15 Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. 16 Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid all his former teaching respecting God was to be void—is, that no evil thought, word, act, whatsoever can have God for its author. But the evil acts which I do proceed from me. I cannot shift them upon any one else. How, then, can I say that I am born of God? I do not say it: that evil act is a disclaimer of my heavenly birth: here is the greatest proof that it is a lying act. I make myself another man; I choose another parent. Your common language justifies this teaching. You say to a child, or a friend, 'It was not your own true self which came out in those words and acts.' . . . St. John gives us the rationale of these common expressions. That man, he says, who does the sinful act is not God's child: he cannot sin; the seed out of which he is formed is altogether good. What is the practical inference? That every one who has disclaimed his true birth by an evil act should reclaim it. When he 'comes to himself'—this is our Lord's expression—he will remember his true Father; he will say, 'I will arise, and go to him;' he will find his Father on his way to meet down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. 17 But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? 18 My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue; but in deed and in truth. 19 And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him.

The beloved apostle can scarce touch upon the mention of sacred love, but he must enlarge upon the enforcement of it, as he here does by divers arguments and incentives thereto; as,

First. That it is a note of our evangelical justification, of our transition into a state of life: "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren," ver. 14. We are by nature children of wrath, and heirs of death. By the Gospel (the gospel covenant or promise) our state (towards another world) is altered and changed. We pass from death to life, from the guilt of death to the right of life; and this transition is made upon our believing in the Lord Jesus. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not hath the wrath of God abiding on him," Jno. iii. 36. Now, this happy change of state we may come to be assured of; "we know that we have passed from death to life;" and we may know it by the evidences of our faith in Christ, of which this love to our brethren is one, which leads us to characterize this love that is such a mark of our justified state. It is not a zeal for a party in the common religion, or an affection for, or an affectation of, those that are of the same denomination and subordinate sentiments with ourselves. But this love,

1. Supposes a general love to mankind; the law of Christian love (in the Christian community) is founded on the catholic law, (in the society of mankind,) "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." Mankind is to be loved (principally) on these two accounts: As the excellent work of God; and, As being beloved in Christ. 1st. As the excellent work of God, made by him, and made in wonderful resemblance of him. The reason that God assigns for the certain punishment of a murderer, is a reason against our hatred of any of the brethren of mankind, and consequently a reason for our love to them; "for in the image of God made he man," Gen. ix. 6. 2nd. As being (in some measure) beloved in Christ. The whole race of mankind (the gens humana) should be considered as being, in distinction from fallen angels, a redeemed nation, as having a Divine Redeemer designed, prepared, and given for them. "So God loved the world," even this world, "that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life," Jno. iii. 16. A world so beloved of God should accordingly be loved by us. And this love will exert itself in earnest desires, and prayers, and attempts for the conversion and salvation of the yet uncalled, blinded world; "My heart's desire and prayer for Israel is, that they may be saved." And then this love will include all due love to enemies themselves. Then this Christian love,

2. Includes a peculiar love to the Christian society, to the catholic church, and that for the sake of her Head, as being his body, as being redeemed, justified, and sanctified in and by him; and this love particularly acts and operates towards those of the catholic church, that we have an opportunity of being personally acquainted with, or credibly informed of. And so they are not so much loved for their own sakes as for the sake of God and Christ, that have loved them. And it is God and Christ (or if you will, the love of God and grace of Christ) that is beloved and valued in them, and towards them. And so this is the issue of faith in Christ, and is thereupon a note of our passage from death to life.

Secondly. The hatred of our brethren is on the contrary a sign of our deadly state, and of our continuance under the legal sentence of death; "He that loveth not his brother" (his brother in Christ) "abideth in death," ver. 14. He yet stands under the curse and condemnation of the law. This the apostle argues by a clear syllogism. Ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him; but he that hates his brother is a murderer; and therefore ye cannot but know that he that hates his brother hath not eternal life abiding in him, ver. 15, or "he abideth in death," as it is expressed, ver. 14. "Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer." For hatred of the person is, so far as it prevails, a hatred of life and welfare, and naturally tends to desire the extinction of it. Cain hated and then slew his brother. And then hatred will shut up the bowels of compassion from the poor brethren, and will thereby expose them to the sorrows of death. And it has appeared that hatred of the brethren has in all ages dressed them up in ill names, odious characters and calumnies, and exposed them to persecution and the sword. No wonder, then, that he that pretty well knows the heart of man, (or is taught by Him that fully knows it,) that knows the natural tendency and issue of vile and violent passions, and knows withal the fulness of the Divine law, declares him that hates his brother to be a murderer. Now he that by the frame and disposition of his heart is a murderer "cannot have eternal life abiding in him." For he that is such must needs be carnally minded, and "to be carnally minded is death," Rom. viii. 6. The apostle, by the expression of having eternal life abiding in us, may seem to mean the possession of an internal principle of endless life; according to that of the Saviour, "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst;" (shall never be totally destitute thereof;) "but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life," Jno. iv. 14. And thereupon some may be apt to surmise that the passing from death to life," ver. 14, does not signify the relative change made in our justification of life, but the real change made in the regeneration to life. And accordingly, that the "abiding in death," mentioned ver. 14, is continuance in spiritual death (as it is usually called) or abiding in the corrupt deadly temper of nature. But as these passages more naturally denote the state of the person, whether adjudged to life or death, so the relative transition from death to life may well be proved or disproved by the possession or non-possession of the inward principle of eternal life; since washing from the guilt of sin, and from the filth and power of sin, are inseparably united. "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 11.

Thirdly. The example of God and Christ should inflame our hearts with this holy love; "Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren," ver. 16. [The words "of God," are not in the original; but, considering that they occur in the next verse, which in the argument hangs upon this, the ellipsis is properly filled up by such words.] The great God hath given his Son to the death for us. But since this apostle hath declared that the Word was God, and that he became flesh for us, I see not why we may not interpret this of God "the Word." Here is the love of God himself, of him who in his own person is God, (though not the Father,) that he assumed a life, that he might lay it down for us! Here is the condescension, the miracle, the mystery, of Divine love, that God would redeem the church with his own blood. [The dying love of Christ being here held up as the great model of love to the brethren, the apostle must be speaking of him rather as the propitiation for our sins, for all the foreseen sins of us his people, (see note on ver. 21, also on ch. ii. 2,) than as the general Redeemer of mankind. Not seldom in the New Testament has the atoning cross this special aspect toward the church of God.] And surely we should love those whom God hath loved, and so loved! and shall certainly do so, if we have any love for God. The apostle, having proposed this flaming, constraining example of, and motive to, love, proceeds to shew us what should be the temper and effect of this our Christian love. And so,

1. It must be, in the highest degree, so fervent as to make us willing to suffer even to the death, for the good of the church, for the safety and salvation of the dear brethren. "And we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren," ver. 16, either in our ministrations and service to them; "yea, and if I be offered upon the service and sacrifice of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all," (I shall congratulate your felicity,) Phil. ii. 17. Or, in exposing ourselves to hazards, when called thereto, for the safety and preservation of those that are more serviceable to the glory of God and the edification of the church than we can be: "Who have for my life laid down their own necks; unto whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles," Rom. xvi. 4. How mortified should the Christian be to this life! How prepared to part with it! And how well assured of a better!

2. It must be, in the next degree, compassionate, liberal, and communicative to the necessities of the brethren. For, "whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up the bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" ver. 17. It pleases God that some of the Christian brethren should be poor, for the exercise of the charity and love of those that are rich. And it pleases the same God to give to some of the Christian brethren this world's good, that they may exercise their grace in communicating to the poor saints. And they that have this world's good must love a good God more, and their good brethren more, and be ready to distribute it for their sakes. It appears here that this love to the brethren is founded upon love to God, in that it is here called so by the apostle. How dwelleth "the love of God in him?" This love to the brethren is love to God in them; and where there is none of this love to them, there is no true love to God at all. [Or, the meaning may be, how can such an one pretend to shew any resemblance or representation of Christ's love in his unworthy character? Christ's love ought still to dwell with men on the earth, in the spirit and conduct of his followers. But doth it dwell, or is it impersonated, in him who will not spare even of his substance for the needy, after the Master has laid down his life for the offending? I was going to intimate the third and lowest degree in the next verse, but the apostle has prevented me by intimating that this last charitable, communicative love in persons of ability is the lowest that can consist with the love of God. But there may be other fruits of this love; and therefore the apostle desires that in all it should be unfeigned and operative, as circumstances will allow. "My little children" (my dear children in Christ!) "let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth," ver. 18. Compliments and flatteries become not Christians; but the sincere expressions of sacred affection, and the services or labours of love do. Then,

Fourthly. This love will evince our sincerity in religion, and give us hope towards God: "And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him," ver. 19. It is a great happiness to be assured of our integrity in religion. They that are so assured may have holy boldness or confidence towards God; they may appeal to him from the censures and condemnation of the world. The way to arrive at the knowledge of our own truth and uprightness in Christianity, and to secure our inward peace, is to abound in love, and in the works of love towards the Christian brethren.

20 For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. 21 Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God. 22 And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight.

The apostle, having intimated that there may be, even among us, such a privilege as an assurance or sound persuasion of heart towards God, proceeds here,

First. To establish the court of conscience, and to assert the authority of it: "For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things," ver. 20. "Our heart" here is our self-reflecting, judicial power; that noble, excellent ability whereby we can take cognizance of ourselves, of our spirits, or dispositions and actions, and accordingly pass a judgment upon our state towards God. And so it is the same with conscience, or the power of moral self-consciousness. This power can act both as witness, judge, and executioner of judgment. It either accuses or excuses, condemns or justifies. It is set and placed in this office by God himself. "The spirit of man" (thus capacitated and empowered) "is the candle of the Lord" (a luminary lighted and set up by the Lord) "searching all the inward parts of the belly," (taking into scrutiny and viewing the penetralia, the 'private recesses,' and secret transactions of the inner man,) Fr. xi. 21. Conscience is God's vicegerent, calls the court in his name, and acts for him; "The answer of a good conscience towards God," 1 Pet. iii. 21. God is Chief Judge of the court. "If our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart;" that is, superior to our heart and conscience, in power and judgment. Hence the act and judgment of the court is the act and judgment of God. As,

1. If conscience condemns us, God does so too; "For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things," ver. 20. God is a greater witness than our conscience, and knoweth more against us than it does. He "knoweth all things." He is a greater Judge than conscience; for as he is supreme, so his judgment shall stand, and shall be fully and finally executed. And this seems to be the design of another apostle, when he says, "For I know nothing by myself," that is, in the case wherein I am censured by some. I am not conscious of any guilt, or allowed unfaithfulness in mystewardship and ministry, "yet am I not hereby justified;" it is not by my own conscience that I must ultimately stand or fall; the justification, or justifying sentence, of my conscience, or self-consciousness, will not determine the controversy between you and me. As you do not appeal to its sentence so neither will you be concluded by its decision. "But he that judgeth me" (supremely and finally

him. Before that he was not himself; he had lost himself." (See Maurice.)

iii. 20. "It is asserted that in the exercise of sincere and practical love we possess an approving self-consciousness, and also a confident appeal to God and assurance in his sight; and the apostle proceeds to show that the former involves the latter. He does this by bringing into consideration the opposite state of things. If our self-consciousness testifies against us à fortiori, he who knows us better than we know ourselves must condemn us too. We have a right, then, to insist upon the same connection in the case supposed. If our self-consciousness acquit us, we have reason to believe that we stand clear in the sight of God" (Webster and Wilkinson).

iii. 22. Keeping God's commandments is the proof of submission of the human will to the Divine, and therefore of that spirit which asks for nothing contrary to the will of God.

iii. 23. Observe the connection between faith and love. The judgeth me, and by whose judgment you and I must be determined) "is the Lord." 1 Cor. iv. 4. Or,

2. If conscience acquit us, God does so too. "Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, [the conclusion is not in terms, neither doth God condemn us; perhaps, lest we should forget that there are many things in the most upright and sanctified of men, by themselves undetected or misjudged, which His purity and perfect law must needs condemn. But, so long as they preserve innocence of will and consciousness, together with humble faith, he accepts for them the intercession of his servant Jesus, covers their sins of ignorance, condemns not themselves for the things he could not but condemn in them, continues to them the testimony and comfort of his Spirit, and so enables them to say,] then have we confidence towards God," ver. 21. Then have we assurance that he accepts us now, and will acquit us in the great day of account. But, possibly, may some presumptuous soul here say, 'I am glad of this; my heart does not condemn me, and therefore I may conclude God does not.' As, on the contrary, upon the foregoing verse, some pious, trembling soul will be ready to cry out, 'God forbid!' My heart or conscience condemns me, and must I then infallibly expect the condemnation of God! But let such know that the errors of the witnesses are not here reckoned as the acts of the court. Ignorance, error, prejudice, partiality, and presumption, may be said to be faults of the officers of the court, or of the attendants of the judge (as the mind, the will, appetite, passion, sensual disposition, or disordered brain) or of the jury, that give a false verdict, not of the judge itself. Conscience (conscience) is properly self-consciousness; acts of ignorance and error are not acts of self-consciousness, but of some mistaken power. And the court of conscience is here described in its process according to the original constitution of it by God himself; according to which process, what is bound in conscience is bound in heaven. Let conscience therefore be heard, be well informed, and diligently attended unto.

Secondly, To indicate the privilege of those that have a good conscience towards God. They have interest in heaven and in the court above; their suits are heard there; "And whatsoever we ask we receive of him," ver. 22. It is supposed that the petitioners do not desire (or do not intend to desire) any thing that is contrary to the honour and glory of the court, or to their own intended spiritual good. And then they may depend upon receiving the good things they ask for. And this supposition may well be made concerning the petitioners, or they may well be supposed to receive the good things they ask for, considering their qualifications and practice; "Because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight," ver. 22. Obedient souls are prepared for blessings, and they have promise of audience. They that commit things displeasing to God cannot expect that he should please them in hearing and answering their prayers, Ps. lvi. 18; Pr. xxviii. 9.

23 And this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment. 24 And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

First, To represent unto us what those commandments primarily and summarily are. They are comprehended in this double one: "And this is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment," ver. 23. [The name of his Son Jesus Christ is an epitome of the mystery of the faith. It suggests that whole doctrine of his complex character and commission which, as being the matter of our faith, and the motive of our love, it is the apostle's primary object in this epistle to develop, vindicate, and apply.] To believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ is, 1. To discern what he is according to his name, to have an intellectual view of his person and office, as the Son of God, and the anointed Saviour of the world; "That every one that seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life," Jno. vi. 40. 2. To approve him in judgment and conscience (that is, in conviction and consciousness of our case) as one wisely and wonderfully prepared and adapted for the whole work of the eternal salvation. 3. To consent to, and acquiesce in him, as our Redeemer and Recoverer unto God. 4. To trust to, and rely upon him, for the full and final discharge of his saving office. "They that know thy name will put their trust in thee," Ps. ix. 10. "I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day," 2 Tim. i. 12. This faith is a needful requisite to those that would be prevalent petitioners with God. Because it is by the Son that we must come to the Father; through his grace and righteousness our persons must be accepted or ingratiated with the Father, Eph. i. 6; through his purchase all our desired blessings must come; and through his intercession our prayers must be heard and answered. This is the first part of the commandment, that must be observed by acceptable worshippers. The second is, "That we love one another, as he gave us commandment," ver. 23. The command of Christ must be continually before our eyes. Christian love must possess our souls when we go to God in prayer. To this end we must remember that our Lord obliges us, 1st. To forgive those that offend us, Mat. vi. 14; and, 2nd. To reconcile ourselves to those that we have offended, Mat. v. 23, 24. As goodwill to men was proclaimed from heaven, so goodwill to men (and particularly to the brethren) must be carried in the hearts of those that go to God and heaven.

Secondly, To represent to us the blessedness of obedience to these commands. The obedient enjoy communion with God; "And he that keepeth his commandments" (and particularly these of faith and love) "dwelleth in him, and he in him," ver. 24. We dwell in God by a happy relation to him, and spiritual union with him, through his Son, and by a holy converse with him; and God dwells in us by his word, and our faith fixed on him, and by the operations of his Spirit. And then there occurs the trial of this Divine inhabitation; "And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us," ver. 24; by that sacred disposition and frame of soul that he hath conferred upon us, which being a spirit of faith in God and Christ, and of love to God and man, appears to be of God.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter the apostle exhorts to try spirits, ver. 1; gives a note to try by, ver. 2, 3; shews who are of the world, and who of God, ver. 4-6; urges Christian love by diverse considerations, ver. 7-16; describes our love to God, and the effect of it, ver. 17-21.

apostle includes both under one commandment. There can be no faith without love ("the greatest of these is charity"), and no love without faith. To believe on Christ implies love towards him, and therefore love towards our fellow-men.

iv. 1. "Try:" "make trial of," "put to the proof." He proceeds to give some tests in verses 2, 3. "Prophets:" not in the sense of foretellers of events to come, but "teachers."

iv. 2. "Is come:" the tense implies not merely a past historical ELOVED, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world. 2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: 3 And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God: and this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it should come; and even now already is it in the world.

The apostle, having said that God's dwelling in and with us may be known by the Spirit that he hath given us, intimates that that Spirit may be discerned and distinguished from other spirits that appear in the world. And so here,

First, He calls his disciples, to whom he writes, to caution and scrutiny, about the spirits and spiritual professors that were now risen.

1. To caution: "Beloved, believe not every spirit;" regard not, trust not, follow not every pretender to the Spirit of God, or every professor of vision, or inspiration, or revelation from God. Truth is [accidentally] the foundation of simulation and counterfeits. There had been real communications from the Divine Spirit, and therefore others pretended thereto. God will take the way of his own wisdom and goodness, though it may be liable to abuse. He has sent inspired teachers to the world, and given us a supernatural revelation, though others may be so evil and so impudent as to pretend to the same. Every pretender to the Divine Spirit, or to inspiration, and extraordinary illumination thereby, is not to be believed. Time was when "the spiritual man" (the man of the Spirit that made a great noise about, and boast of, the Spirit) "was mad," Hos. ix. 7.

2. To scrutiny, to examination of the claims that are laid to the Spirit: "But try the spirits whether they are of God," ver. 1. God has given of his Spirit in these latter ages of the world; but not to all that profess to come furnished therewith. To the disciples is allowed a judgment of discretion in reference to the spirits that would be believed and trusted in the affairs of religion. A reason is given for this trial; "Because many false prophets are gone out into the world," ver. 1. There being, much about the time of our Saviour's appearance in the world, a general expectation among the Jews of a Redeemer to Israel; and the humiliation, spiritual reformation and sufferings of the Saviour being taken as a prejudice against him, others were induced to set up as prophets and Messiahs to Israel, according to the Saviour's prediction, Mat. xxiv. 23, 24. It should not seem strange to us that false teachers set themselves up in the church. It was so in the apostles' times. Fatal is the spirit of delusion; sad that men should vaunt themselves for prophets and inspired teachers that are by no means so!

Secondly, He gives a test whereby the disciples may try these pretending spirits. These spirits set up for prophets, doctors, or dictators in religion, and so they are to be tried by their doctrine; and the test whereby, in that day, or in that part of the world where the apostle now resided (for in various seasons, and in various churches, tests were different) must be this, "hereby know ye the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God," ver. 2. Or, "that confesseth Jesus Christ, that came in the flesh." [Think, reader; if Jesus Christ were a mere man, how unsuitable the form of the announcement, that he came, and came in the flesh; as though he had existed previously to his so coming, and could have come in some other nature! And how strange, that the confession of a truism, including what logicians call a suggestio falsi, should be the test and token of a sound Christian teacher! And how wonderful that the apostle John should be at the pains to write an epistle to the churches mainly in defence of the allegation that a certain man was born in human nature! But away with such trifling. The truth and worth of the supposed confession turn entirely on its recognising Jesus Christ as that Incarnate Son of God who should come, and come to save sinners.] Jesus Christ is to be confessed as the Son of God, the eternal Life and Word that was with the Father from the beginning; as the Son of God that came into, and came in, our human mortal nature, and therein suffered and died at Jerusalem. He that confesses and preaches this, by a mind supernaturally instructed and enlightened therein, does it by the Spirit of God, or God is the Author of that illumination. And, on the contrary, "every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (or that Jesus Christ, that came in the flesh) "is not of God," ver. 4. God has given so much testimony to Jesus Christ, that was lately here in the world and in the flesh, (or in a fleshly body like ours,) though now in heaven, that ye may be assured that any impulse or pretended inspiration that contradicts this is far from being from heaven and of God. The sum of revealed religion is comprehended in the doctrine concerning Christ, his person and office. We see then the aggravation of a formed opposition against him and it. "And this is that spirit of antichrist whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world," ver. 3. It was foreknown by God that antichrists would arise, and antichristian spirits oppose his Spirit and his truth. It was foreknown, also, that one eminent antichrist would arise, and make a long and fatal war against the Christ of God, and his institutions, and honour, and kingdom in the world. This great antichrist would have his way prepared, and his rise facilitated, by other lesser antichrists, and the spirit of error working, and disposing men's minds for him. The antichristian spirit began betimes, even in the apostles' days. Dreadful and unsearchable is the judgment of God, that persons should be given over to an antichristian spirit, and to such darkness and delusion as to set themselves against the Son of God, and all the testimony that the Father hath given to the Son. But we have been foretold and forewarned that such opposition would arise. We should therefore cease to be offended; and the more we see the word of Christ fulfilled, the more confirmed we should be in the truth of it.

4 Ye are of God, little children, and have fact, but the continuance of it to the present—i.e., not merely that the incarnation took place, but still is. The statement here made also implies that he who came in the flesh had a previous existence (see verse 15; also John i. 14). The Docetæ denied the reality of our Lord's humanity, and Cerinthus asserted that the heavenly Christ was united to the man Jesus at his baptism. St. John's statement cuts at the root of both these errors.

iv. 3. "Antichrist:" see Note to chap. ii. 18.

overcome them: because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world. 5 They are of the world: therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them. 6 We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

In these verses the apostle encourages the disciples against the fear and danger of this seducing, antichristian spirit, and that by such methods as these:—

First. He assures them of a more Divine principle in them: "Ye are of God, little children," ver. 4. "Ye are God's little children." "We are of God," ver. 6. "We are born of God, taught of God, anointed of God, and so secured against infectious, fatal delusions. God has his chosen, that shall not be mortally seduced."

Secondly. He gives them hope of victory: "And have overcome them," ver. 4. "Ye have hitherto overcome these deceivers, and their temptations; and there is good ground of hope that ye will do so still, and that upon these two accounts. 1. There is a strong preserver within you, 'because greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world,' ver. 4. The Spirit of God dwells in you; and that Spirit is more mighty than men or devils. It is a great happiness to be under the influence of the Holy Ghost. 2. Ye are not of the same temper with these deceivers. The Spirit of God hath framed your mind for God and heaven. 'But they are of the world.' The spirit that prevails in them leads them to this world; their heart is addicted thereto. They study the pomp, the pleasure, and interest, of the world; 'And therefore speak they of the world.' They profess a worldly Messiah and Saviour; they project a worldly kingdom and dominion. The possessions and treasures of the world would they engross to themselves, forgetting that the true Redeemer's kingdom is not of this world. And this worldly design procures them proselytes; 'And the world heareth them,' ver. 5. They are followed by such as themselves. The world will love its own, and its own will love it. But they are in a fair way to conquer pernicious seductions that have conquered the love of this seducing world. Then,

Thirdly. He represents to them that though their company might be the smaller, yet it was the better; they had more Divine and holy knowledge: "He that knoweth God, heareth us." He that knows the purity and holiness of God, the love and grace of God, the truth and faithfulness of God, the ancient word and prophecies of God, the signals and testimonials of God, must know that he is with us. And he that knows this will attend to us, and abide with us. He that is well furnished with natural religion will the more faithfully cleave to the Christian. "He that knoweth God" (in his natural and moral excellencies, revelations, and works) "heareth us," ver. 6. As, on the contrary, "He that is not of God heareth not us." He that knows not God regards not us. He that is not born of God (walking according to his natural disposition) walks not with us. The farther any are from God, (as appears in all ages,) the farther they are from Christ and his faithful servants. And the more addicted persons are to this world, the more remote they are from the spirit of Christianity. And thus you have a distinction betwixt us and others; "Hereby know we the spirit of truth and the spirit of error," ver. 6. This doctrine concerning the Saviour's person, leading you from the world to God, is a signature of the spirit of truth, in opposition to the spirit of error. The more pure and holy any doctrine is, the more likely to be of God.

7 Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. 8 He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love. 9 In this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. 10 Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. 11 Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. 12 No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. 13 Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

As the spirit of truth is known by doctrine, (so spirits are to be tried,) it is known by love likewise. And so here follows a strong, fervent exhortation to holy Christian love: "Beloved, let us love one another," ver. 7. The apostle would unite them together in his love, that he may unite them in love to each other. "Beloved," I beseech ye, by the love I bear to you, that you put on unfeigned mutual love. This exhortation is pressed and urged with variety of argument. As,

First. From the high and heavenly descent of love; "For love is of God." He is the Fountain, Author, Parent, and Commander of love; it is the sum of his law and Gospel; "and every one that loveth" (whose spirit is framed to judicious holy love) "is born of God," ver. 7. The Spirit of God is the Spirit of love. The new nature in the children of God is the offspring of his love; and the temper and complexion of it is love. "The fruit of the Spirit is love," Gal. v. 22. Love comes down from heaven.

Secondly. Love argues a true and just apprehension of the Divine nature: "He that loveth, knoweth God," ver. 7. "He that loveth not, knoweth not God," ver. 8. What attribute of the Divine majesty so clearly shines in all the world as his communicative goodness, which is love! The wisdom, the greatness, the harmony and usefulness of the vast creation, that so fully demonstrate his being, do at the same time shew and prove his love. And natural reason inferring and collecting the nature and excellence of the most absolute perfect being, must collect and find that he is most highly good. And "he that loveth not" (is not quickened by the knowledge he hath of God to the affection and practice of love) "knoweth not God." It is a convictive evidence that the sound and due knowledge of God dwells not in such a soul. His love must needs shine among his primary, brightest perfections. "For God is love," ver. 8. His nature and essence is love; his will and works are (primarily) love. Not that this is the only conception we are to have of him. We have found that he is light as well as love, ch. i. 5; and God is principally love to himself, and he has such perfections as arise from the necessary love he must bear to his necessary existence, excellence, and glory. But love is natural and essential to the Divine majesty; "God is love." That God is love is argued from the display and demonstration that he hath given of it; as,

1. That he hath loved us, such as we are: "In this was manifested the love of God towards us," ver. 9, towards us mortals, us ungrateful rebels. "God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were sinners Christ died for us," Rom. v. 8. Strange that God should love impure, vain, vile dust and ashes!

2. That he hath loved us at such a rate, at such an incomparable value, as he has given for us; he has given his own, only beloved, blessed Son for us: "Because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him," ver. 9. This person is in some peculiar distinguishing way the Son of God; he is the only begotten. Should we suppose him begotten as a creature, or created being, he is not the only begotten. Should we suppose him a natural, necessary irradiation from the Father's glory, or glorious essence, (or substance,) he must be the only begotten. And then it will be a mystery and miracle of Divine love that such a Son should be sent into our world for us. It may well be said, "so" (so wonderfully, so amazingly, so incredibly) "God loved the world."

3. That God loved us first, and in the circumstances in which we lay: "Herein is love," (unusual, unprecedented love,) "not that we loved God, but that he loved us," ver. 10. He loved us when we had no love for him, when we lay in our guilt, misery, and blood; when we were undeserving, ill-deserving, polluted, and unclean, and wanted to be washed from our sins in sacred blood.

4. That he gave us his Son for such service and such an end. For such service; "To be the propitiation for our sins." Consequently, to die for us, to die under the law and curse of God, to bear our sins in his own body, to be crucified, to be wounded in his soul and pierced in his side, to be dead and buried for us, ver. 10. And then for such an end, for such a good and beneficial end to us, "that we might live through him," ver. 9; might live for ever through him; might live in heaven, live with God, and live in eternal glory and blessedness with him and through him. O what love is here! (It may be observed that in these verses, 9 and 10, and again in ver. 14, 15, the apostle collects into one complete though compendious Gospel those fragments of truth, each glancing the prismatic hues of the whole, and manifesting its own relation to it, which are found throughout the epistle in such forms as "Jesus the Son of God," "Jesus the Christ," "Christ come in the flesh," &c.) Then,

Thirdly. Divine love to the brethren should constrain ours: "Beloved," I would adjure you by your interest in my love to remember, "if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another," ver. 11. This should be an invincible argument; the example of God should press us. "We should be followers (or imitators) of him as his dear children." The objects of the Divine love should be the objects of ours. Shall we refuse to love those whom the eternal God hath loved? We should be admirers of his love, and lovers of his love, (of that benevolence and complacency that is in him,) and consequently lovers of those whom he loves. The general love of God to the world should induce an universal love among mankind: "That ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust," Mat. v. 45. The peculiar love of God to the church and to the saints should be productive of a peculiar love there. If God so loved us, we ought surely, in some measure suitably thereto, to love one another.

Fourthly. The Christian love is an assurance of the Divine inhabitation; "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us," ver. 12. Now God dwelleth in us, not by any visible presence, or immediate appearance to the eye; "No man hath seen God at any time," ver. 12; but by his Spirit, ver. 13; or, "No man hath seen God at any time," he does not here present himself to our eye, or to our immediate intuition; and so he does not that way demand and exact our love; but he demands and expects it in that way in which he has thought meet to deserve and claim it. And that is in the illustration that he has given of himself and of his love, and thereupon of his loveliness too, in the catholic church, and particularly in the brethren, the members of that church. In them, and in his appearance for them and with them, is God to be loved.

[Or, rather, the meaning is, Though we cannot see God, or comprehend his sublime essence, yet we may spiritually know him, and even have something of God dwelling in us, through the action and reaction of holy love; for, having first experienced his love toward us, in the blessings of attested pardon and adoption, we then become blissfully conscious of a love to our heavenly Father and to one another, as his children, so congenial to the Divinity, so certainly of God, that we may be said, without irreverence, to know something of what he is by what his wonder-working grace has made even to us to be: see ver. 13 and last clause of ver. 17. O for the full fellowship of this mystery!]

"Thee may I love, for God thou art; Thee may I feel, for God is love!"]

And thus, "if we love one another, God dwelleth in us." The sacred lovers of the brethren are the temples of God; the Divine Majesty has a peculiar residence there.

Fifthly. Therein the Divine love attains a considerable end and accomplishment in us; "And his love is perfected in us," ver. 12. It hath obtained its completion in and upon us. God's love is not perfected in him, but in and with us. His love could not be designed to be ineffectual and fruitless upon us. When its proper, genuine end and issue are attained and produced thereby, it may be said to be perfected; so faith is perfected by its works, and love perfected by its operations. When the Divine love hath wrought us to the same image, to the love of God, and thereupon to the love of the brethren, the children of God, for his sake, it is therein and so far perfected and completed; though this love of ours is not at present perfect, nor the ultimate end of the Divine love to us. How ambitious should we be of this fraternal, Christian love, when God reckons his own love to us perfected thereby! To this the apostle, having mentioned the high favour of God's dwelling in us, subjoins the note and character thereof; "Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit," ver. 13. Certainly this mutual inhabitation is something more noble and great than we are well acquainted with or can declare. One would think that for God to dwell in us, and we in him, were words too high for mortals to use, had not God gone before us herein. What it is hath been briefly said on ch. iii. 24; what it fully is must be left to the revelation of the blessed word. But this mutual inhabitation "we know," says the apostle, "because he hath given us of his Spirit." He hath lodged the image and fruit of his Spirit in our hearts, ver. 13; and the

iv. 6. "The apostle is giving a test to distinguish, not the children of God from those who are not the children of God, but the spirit of truth from the spirit of error. And this he does by saying that in the case of the teachers of truth, they are heard and received by those who apprehend God, but refused by those who are not of God" (Alford).

iv. 6. "Hereby:" "from this"—i.e., what has been just said, in verses 5, 6. "Know:" "distinguish," "recognise."

iv. 7. Resumption of the exhortation to love, but in nearer and deeper connection with our birth from and knowledge of God, who is love.

iv. 12. "No man hath seen God," &c.: explaining why, in verse 11, instead of saying, "If God so loved us, we ought also to love God," he had said, "we ought to love one another;" the brethren being the visible recipients of our outward kindness, which flows from love to God.

Spirit that he hath given us appears to be his, or of him, since it is "the Spirit of power," (of zeal and magnanimity for God,) "of love," (to God and man,) and "of a sound mind," of an understanding well instructed in the affairs of God and religion, and his kingdom among men, 2 Tim. i. 7.

14 And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. 15 Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God. 16 And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him.

Since faith in Christ works love to God, and love to God must kindle love to the brethren, the apostle here confirms the prime article of the Christian faith as the foundation of such love; where,

First. He proclaims the fundamental article of the Christian religion, which is so representative of the love of God; "And we have seen, and do testify, that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world," ver. 14. We here see, 1. The Lord Jesus' relation to God. He is Son to the Father, such a Son as no one else is, and so as to be God with the Father.

2. His relation and office towards us; "The Saviour of the world." He saves us by his death, and example, and intercession, and Spirit, and power against the enemies of our salvation.

3. The ground on which he became so. By the mission of him; "The Father sent the Son." He decreed and willed his coming hither, in and with the consent of the Son.

4. The apostle's assurance of this. He and his brethren had seen it. They had seen the Son of God in his human nature, in his holy converse and works, in his transfiguration on the mount, in his death and resurrection from the dead, and royal ascent to heaven. They had so seen him as to be satisfied that he was "the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth."

5. The apostle's attestation of this, in pursuance of such evidence; "We have seen, and do testify." The weight of this truth obliges us to testify it; the salvation of the world lies upon it; the evidence of the truth warrants us to testify it; our eyes, and ears, and hands have been witnesses of it. Thereupon,

Secondly. The apostle states the excellency, or the excellent privilege attending the due acknowledgment of this truth; "Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God," ver. 15. This confession seems to include faith in the heart as the foundation of it; acknowledgment with the mouth to the glory of God and Christ; and profession in the life and conduct, in opposition to the flatteries or frowns of the world. Thus "no man says that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost," by the external attestation and internal operation of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 3. And so he that thus confesses Christ, and God in him, is enriched with or possessed by the Spirit of God, and has a complacental knowledge of God and much holy enjoyment of him. Then,

Thirdly. The apostle applies this in order to the excitation of holy love. God's love is thus seen and exerted in Christ Jesus; "And" thus "have we known and believed the love that God hath to us," ver. 16. The Christian revelation is what should endear it to us, the revelation of the Divine love. The articles of our revealed faith are but so many articles relating to the Divine love. The history of the Lord Christ is the history of God's love to us. All his transactions in and with his Son were but testifications of his love to us, and means to advance us to the love of God; "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," 2 Cor. v. 19. And hence we may learn,

1. That "God is love," ver. 16. He is essential, boundless love. He has incomparable, incomprehensible love for us of this world, which he has demonstrated in the mission and whole mediation of his beloved Son. It is the great objection and prejudice against the Christian revelation that the love of God should be so strange and unaccountable as to give his own eternal Son for us. It is the prejudice of many against the eternity and deity of the Son, that so great a person should be given for us. It is, I confess, mysterious and unsearchable; but there are unsearchable riches in Christ. It is pity the vastness of the Divine love should be made a prejudice against the revelation and the belief of it. But what will not God do, when he designs to demonstrate the height of any perfection of his! When he would shew somewhat of his power and wisdom, he makes such a world as this. When he would shew more of his grandeur and glory, he makes heaven for the ministering spirits that are before the throne. What will he not do, then, when he designs to demonstrate his love, and to demonstrate his highest love, or that "he himself is love," or that love is one of the most bright, dear, transcendent, operative excellencies of his unbounded nature, and to demonstrate this not only to us but to the angelic world, and to the principalities and powers above; and this not for our surprise for awhile, but for the admiration, and praise, and adoration of our most exalted powers to all eternity? What will not God then do? Surely, then, it will look more agreeable to the design, and grandeur, and pregnancy of his love, (if I may so call it,) to give an eternal Son for us, than to make a son on purpose for our relief. In such a dispensation as that of giving a natural, eternal Son for us and to us, he will commend his love to us indeed. And what will not the God of love do when he designs to commend his love, and to commend it in the view of heaven, and earth, and hell! and when he will commend himself and recommend himself to us and to our highest conviction, and also affection, as love itself! And what if it should appear at last, which I shall only offer to the consideration of the judicious, that the Divine love, and particularly God's love in Christ, should be the foundation of the glories of heaven, in the present enjoyment of those ministering spirits that comported with it, and of the salvation of this world, and of the torments of hell? This last will seem most strange. But what if therein it should appear not only that God is love to himself in vindicating his own law, and government, and love, and glory, but that the damned ones are made so, or are so punished, 1st. Because they despised the love of God already manifested and exhibited. 2nd. Because they refused to be beloved in what was farther proposed and promised. And, 3rd. Because they made themselves unmeet to be the objects of Divine complacency and delight. If the consciences of the damned should accuse them of these things, and especially of rejecting the highest instance of Divine love; if the far greatest part of the intelligent creation should be everlastingly blessed, through the highest instance of the Divine love, then may it well be inscribed upon the whole creation of God, God is love.

2. That hereupon "he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him," ver. 16. There is great communion between the God of love and the loving soul; that is, him that loves the [living and spiritual] creation of God, according to its different relation to God, and reception from him, and interest in him. He that dwells in sacred love has the love of God shed abroad upon his heart, has the impress of God upon his spirit, the Spirit of God sanctifying and sealing him, lives in the meditation, views, and tastes of the Divine love, and will, ere long, go to dwell with God for ever.

17 Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world. 18 There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love. 19 We love him, because he first loved us. 20 If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? 21 And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also.

The apostle, having thus excited and enforced sacred love, from the great pattern and motive of it,—the love that is and dwells in God himself,—proceeds to recommend it farther by other considerations; and he recommends it in both the branches of it, both as love to God and love to our brother or Christian neighbour.

First. As love to God, to the primum amabile,—"the first and chief of all amiable beings and objects;" he that hath the confluence of all beauty, excellence, and loveliness in himself, and confers on all other beings whatever renders them good and amiable. Love to God seems here to be recommended on these accounts:—

1. It will give us peace and satisfaction of spirit in the day when it will be most needed, or when it will be the greatest pleasure and blessing imaginable: "Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment," ver. 17. There must be a day of universal judgment. Happy they that shall have holy, fiducial boldness before the Judge at that day! that shall be able to lift up their heads, and to look him in the face, as knowing he is their Friend and Advocate! Happy they that have holy boldness and assurance in the prospect of that day; that look and wait for it, and for the Judge's appearance! So do, and so may do, the lovers of God. Their love to God assures them of God's love to them, and consequently of the friendship of the Son of God. The more we love our Friend, especially when we are sure that he knows it, the more we can trust his love. As God is good, and loving, and faithful to his promise, so we can easily be persuaded of his love, and the happy fruits of his love, when we can say, Thou that knowest all things, knowest that we love thee. "And hope maketh not ashamed," (our hope conceived by the consideration of God's love will not defeat us,) "because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, that is given to us," Rom. v. 5. Possibly here by "the love of God" may be meant our love to God, that is shed abroad upon our hearts by the Holy Ghost; this is the foundation of our hope, or of our assurance that our hope will hold good at last. Or, if by "the love of God" is meant the sense and apprehension of his love to us, yet that must suppose or include us as lovers of him in this case, and indeed the sense and evidence of his love to us sheds abroad upon our hearts love to him; and thereupon we have confidence towards him, and peace and joy in him. He will give the crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing. And we have this boldness towards Christ because of our conformity to him; "Because as he is, so are we in this world," ver. 17. Love hath conformed us to him. As he was the great lover of God and man, he hath taught us in our measure to be so too; and he will not deny his own image. Love teaches us to conform in sufferings too. We suffer for him and with him, and therefore cannot but hope and trust that we shall also be glorified together with him, 2 Tim. ii. 12.

2. It prevents or removes the uncomfortable result and fruit of servile fear; "There is no fear in love," ver. 18. So far as love prevails, fear ceases. We must here distinguish, I judge, between fear and being afraid; or in this case, between the fear of God and being afraid of him. The fear of God is oft mentioned and commanded as the substance of religion, 1 Pet. ii. 17; Rev. xiv. 7; and so it imports the high regard and veneration we have for God, and his authority and government. Such fear is consistent with love; yea, with perfect love, as being in the angels themselves. But then there is a being afraid of God; this arises from a sense of guilt, and a view of his vindictive perfections; in the view of them God is represented as a consuming fire. And so fear here may be rendered dread. There is no dread in love; love considers its object as good and excellent, and therefore amiable and worthy to be beloved. Love considers God as most eminently good, and most eminently loving us in Christ, and so puts off dread and puts on joy in him; and as love grows joy grows too; so that "perfect love casteth out fear," or dread. They that perfectly love God are, from his nature, and counsel, and covenant, perfectly assured of his love; and consequently are perfectly free from any dismal, dreadful suspicions of his punitive power and justice as armed against them. They well know that God loves them, and they thereupon triumph in his love. That perfect love casteth out fear the apostle thus sensibly argues, that which casteth out torment, casteth out fear or dread; "Because fear hath torment," ver. 18. Fear is known to be a disquieting, torturing passion, especially such a fear as is the dread of an almighty, avenging God; but perfect love casteth out torment, for it teaches the mind a perfect acquiescence and complacency in the beloved; and therefore "perfect love casteth out fear," or, which is here equivalent, "He that feareth is not made perfect in love," ver. 18. It is a sign that our love is far from being perfect, since our doubts, and fears, and dismal apprehensions of God are so many. Let us long for and hasten to, the world of perfect love, where our serenity and joy in God will be as perfect as our love!

3. From the source and rise of it, which is the antecedent love of God; "We love him, because he first loved us," ver. 19. His love is the incentive, the motive and moral cause of ours. We cannot but love so good a God, that was first in the act and work of love; that loved us when we were both unloving and unlovely; that loved us at so great a rate; that has been seeking and soliciting our love at the expense of his Son's blood; and hath condescended to beseech us to be reconciled unto him. Let heaven and earth stand amazed at recognition of God's love is a condition of abiding in him and he in us."

iv. 17. Here the apostle grounds our confidence on the fact of the absolute likeness of the Christian to Christ; for Christ will not condemn those who bear his own likeness.

iv. 20. "The man says, 'I love God.' St. John meets him with the question, 'What do you love?' An unseen Being, if it is the true God whom you love; but an unseen Being who has declared such love! His love is the productive cause of ours; "Of his own will," of his own free, loving will, "begat he us." To those that love him all things work together for good; "to them who are the called according to his purpose." They that love God are the called thereto according to his purpose, Rom. viii. 28. According to whose purpose they are called is sufficiently intimated in the following clauses; "whom he did predestinate," or antecedently purpose, namely, to the image of his Son, "them he also called," effectually recovered thereto. The Divine love instamped love upon our souls. May the Lord still and farther direct our hearts into the love of God! 2 Thes. iii. 5.

Secondly, As love to our brother and neighbour in Christ. Such love is argued and urged on these accounts:—

1. As suitable and consonant to our Christian profession. In the profession of Christianity we profess to love God as the root of religion. "If then a man say," or profess as much as thereby to say, "I love God," am a lover of his name, and house, and worship, "and" yet "hateth his brother," whom he should love for God's sake, "he is a liar," ver. 20; he therein giveth his profession the lie. That such an one loveth not God the apostle proveth by the usual facility of loving what is seen rather than what is unseen; "For he that loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen, how can he love God, whom he hath not seen?" ver. 20. The eye is wont to affect the heart; things unseen do less catch the mind, and thereby the heart. The incomprehensibility of God does very much arise from his invisibility. The member of Christ has much of God visible in him. How, then, shall the hater of a visible image of God pretend to love the unseen Original, the invisible God himself!

2. As suitable to the express law of God and the just reason of it; "And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also," ver. 21. As God has communicated his image in nature and in grace, so he would have our love to be suitably diffused. We must love God originally and supremely, and others in him, on the account of their derivation and reception from him, and of his interest in them. Now, our Christian brethren having a new nature and excellent privileges derived from God, and God having his interest in them as well as in us, it cannot but be a natural, suitable obligation that he that loves God should love his brother also.

In this chapter the apostle asserts, I. The dignity of believers, ver. 1. II. Their obligation to love, and the trial of it, ver. 1—3. III. Their victory, ver. 4, 5. IV. The credibility and confirmation of their faith, ver. 6—10. V. The advantage of their faith in eternal life, ver. 11—13. VI. The audience of their prayers, unless for those that have sinned unto death, ver. 14—17. VII. Their preservation from sin and Satan, ver. 18. VIII. Their happy distinction from the world, ver. 19. IX. Their true knowledge of God, ver. 20; upon which they must depart from idols, ver. 21.

WHOEVER believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat loveth him also that is begotten of him. 2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments. 3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous. 4 For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. 5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?

First: The apostle having, as was there observed, in the conclusion of the last chapter, urged Christian love upon those two accounts,—as suitable to Christian profession, and as suitable to the Divine command,—here (as a third: Such love is suitable, or indeed demanded, by their eminent relation. Our Christian brethren, or fellow-believers, are nearly related to God: they are his children. "Whoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born [or begotten] of God," ver. 1. Wherein the Christian brother is,

1. Described by his faith. He that believeth that Jesus is the Christ; that he is Messiah, the Prince; that he is the Son of God by nature and office; that he is the chief of all the anointed world; chief of all the priests, prophets, or kings that were ever anointed by God or for him; that he is perfectly prepared and furnished for the whole work of the eternal salvation. And the believer accordingly yields himself up to his care and conduct. And then is,

2. Dignified by his descent: "He is born of God," ver. 1. This principle of faith, and the new nature that attends it, or from which it springs, is ingenerated by the Spirit of God; and so sonship and adoption are not now appropriated to the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, nor to the ancient Israel of God. All believers, though by nature sinners of the Gentiles, are spiritually descended from God, and accordingly are to be beloved; as it is added, "Every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him," ver. 1. It seems but natural that he that loves the Father should love the children also, and that in some proportion to their resemblance to their Father, and to the Father's love to them. And so we must first and principally love the Son of the Father, as he is most emphatically styled, 2 Jno. 3, the only necessarily begotten and the Son of his love; and then those that are voluntarily begotten and renewed by the Spirit of grace. [Hence, brotherly love can only be reciprocated between brethren in Christ. We have only leave thus to love the regenerate; and we have only power thus to love as we ourselves are so. This next verse implies both conditions.] Thereupon,

Secondly. The apostle shews,

1. How we may discern the truth, or the true evangelical nature, of our love to the regenerate; the ground of it must be our love to God, whose they are, "By this we know that we love the children of God," [as such], "when we love God," ver. 2. [This proposition is the converse of the preceding one, which might have run, By this we know that we love God, when we love the children of God.] Our love to them appears to be sound and genuine when we love them not merely upon any secular account, as because they are rich, or learned, or kind to us, or of our denomination among religious parties; but because they are God's children, his regenerating grace appears in them, his image and supscription is upon them, and so in them God himself is loved. And so we see what that love to the brethren is, that is so pressed in this epistle; it is love to them as the children of God and the adopted brethren of the Lord Jesus. [Now, we can only be sure that our love to them is of this nature and origin when, from other evidence, and especially that of a conscious general conformity to this holy law, we have reason humbly to believe that we love God, and are men of a spiritual mind.]

2. How we may learn the truth of our love to God; it appears in our holy obedience: "When we love God and keep his commandments," ver. 2; then we truly, and in gospel account, love God when we keep his commandments; for this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and the keeping of his commandments requires a spirit inclined thereto, and delighting therein, "and" so "his commandments are not grievous," ver. 3. Or, This is the love of God, that as thereby we are determined to obedience, and to keep the commandments of God, so his commandments are thereby made easy and pleasant to us. The lover of God says, "O how I love thy law! I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart," Ps. cxix. 32: when thou shalt either enlarge it with love, or with thy Spirit that is the spring of love.

3. What is and ought to be the result and effect of regeneration, namely, an intellectual, spiritual conquest of this world: "For whatsoever is born of God," (or, as in some copies, 'whosoever is born of God,') "overcometh the world," ver. 4; [which is the chief thing that makes this commandment grievous and difficult of practising.] He that is born of God is born for God, and consequently for another world. He has a temper and disposition that tend to a higher, better world; and he is furnished with such arms, or such a weapon, whereby he can repel and conquer this; as it is added, "and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith," ver. 4. Faith is the cause of victory, the means, the instrument, the spiritual armour and artillery by which we overcome. For, 1st. In and by faith we cleave to Christ, in contempt of and opposition to the world. 2nd. Faith works in and by love to God and Christ, and so withdraws us from the love of the world. 3rd. Faith sanctifies the heart, and purifies it from those sensual lusts by which the world obtains such sway and dominion over souls. 4th. It receives and derives strength from the object of it, the Son of God, for conquering the frowns and flatteries of the world. 5th. It obtains by gospel promise a right to the indwelling Spirit of grace, that is greater than he that dwells in the world. 6th. It sees an invisible world at hand, with which this world is not worthy to be compared, and into which it tells the soul in which it resides it must be continually prepared to enter. And thereupon,

Thirdly. The apostle concludes that it is the real Christian that is the true conqueror of the world. "Who is he" then "that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" ver. 5. It is the world that lies in our way to heaven, and is the great impediment to our entrance there. But he that believes that Jesus is the Son of God, believes therein that Jesus came from God to be the Saviour of the world, and powerfully to conduct us from the world to heaven and to God, who is fully to be enjoyed there. And he that so believes must needs, by this faith, overcome the world; for,

1. He must be well satisfied that this world is a vehement enemy to his soul, to his holiness, his salvation, and his blessedness; "For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world," ch. ii. 16.

2. He sees it must be a great part of the Saviour's work, and of his own salvation, to be redeemed and rescued from this malignant world; "Who gave himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world," Gal. i. 4.

3. He sees in and by the life and conduct of the Lord Jesus on earth that this world is to be renounced and overcome.

4. He perceives that the Lord Jesus conquered the world not for himself only, but for his followers, and they must study to be partakers of his victory; "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world."

5. He is taught and influenced by the Lord Jesus's death to be mortified and crucified to the world; "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world," Gal. vi. 14.

6. He is begotten by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead to the lively hope of a blessed world above, 1 Pet. i. 3.

7. He knows that the Saviour is gone to heaven, and is there preparing a place for his serious believers, Jno. xiv. 2.

8. He knows that his Saviour will come again from thence, and will put an end to this world, and judge the inhabitants of it, and receive his believers to his presence and glory, Jno. xiv. 3.

9. He is possessed with a spirit and disposition that cannot be satisfied with this world, that look beyond it, and are still tending, striving, and pressing towards the world in heaven; "In this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven," 2 Cor. v. 2. So that it is the Christian religion that affords its pre-elytes an universal empire. It is the Christian revelation on that is the great means of conquering the world, and gaining another that is most pure and peaceful, blessed and eternal. It is there, in that revelation, that we see what is the occasion and ground of the quarrel and contest between the holy God and this rebellious world. It is there we meet with sacred doctrine, both speculative and practical, that is quite contrary to the tenor, temper, and tendency of this world. It is by that doctrine that a spirit is communicated and diffused that is superior and adverse to the spirit of the world. It is there we see that the Saviour himself was not of this world; that his kingdom was not and is not so; that it must be separated from the world and gathered out of it for heaven and for God. There we see that the Saviour resigns not this world for the inheritance and portion of his saved company. As he is gone to heaven himself, so he assures them he goes to prepare for their residence there, a designing they should always dwell with him, and allowing them to believe that if in this life, and this world only, they had hope in him, they should at last be but miserable. It is there that the eternal, blessed world is most clearly revealed and proposed to our affection and pursuit. It is there we are furnished with the best arms and artillery against the assaults and attempts of the world. It is there we are taught how the world may be outshot in its own bow, or its artillery turned against itself, and its oppositions, encounters, and persecutions be made serviceable to our conquest of the world, and to our motion and ascent to the higher, heavenly world; and there we are encouraged by a whole army and cloud of holy soldiers, that have in their several ages, posts, and stations, overcome the world and won the crown. It is the real Christian that is the proper hero, that vanquishes the world, and rejoices in a universal victory; and then, as being far superior to the Grecian monarch, mourns not that there is not another world to be subdued, but lays hold on the eternal world of life, and, in a sacred that the beings you see, you converse with, are made in his image; a Father who has said, 'These are my offspring.' And these images of his have nothing that attracts you! this offspring of his you positively hate! There is but one word for such profession, from whomsoever it comes—it is a lie. If you have an aversion for the human likeness, you must have an aversion for the Divine prototype." (See Maurice's "Lectures.")

v. 1. Compare chap. iv. 20. St. John first points out who it is who is

"begotten of God"—viz., he who believeth that Jesus is the Christ—and then asserts that every one loving God, who had thus begotten, must of necessity extend his love to the brother begotten of God.

v. 2. See chap. iv. 20. As there our love to our brother was made the sign and condition of our love to God, so here our love to God, shown by obedience to his commands, is the measure of our love to the children of God. Either of the two being present, the other is sure to follow.

course, takes the kingdom of heaven by violence too. Who in all the world but the believer on Jesus Christ can thus overcome the world?

6 This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth. 7 For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. 8 And there are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one. 9 If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son.

The faith of the Christian believer, or the believer in Christ, being thus mighty and victorious, it had need to be well founded, to be furnished with unquestionable, celestial evidence concerning the Divine mission, authority, and office of the Lord Jesus. And it is so; he brings his credentials along with him; and he brings them both in the way by which he came and in the witness that attends him.

First. In the way and manner by which he came; not barely by which he came into the world, but by and with which he came, and appeared, and acted as a Saviour in the world; "This is he that came by water and blood;" [as it had been appointed and promised that God's Son and Messiah should come. Jesus, therefore, is that very person.] He came to save us from our sins, to give us eternal life, and to bring us to God; and that he might the more assuredly do this, "he came by," or with, "water and blood, even Jesus Christ;" Jesus Christ, I say, did so, and none but he; and I say it again, "not by," or with, "water only, but by" and with "water and blood," ver. 6. Jesus Christ came with water and blood, as the notes and signatures of the true effectual Saviour of the world. And he came by water and blood, as the means by which he would heal and save us. That he must and did thus come in his saving office may appear by our remembering these things:—

1. We are inwardly and outwardly defiled; inwardly by the power and pollution of sin in our nature. For our cleansing from this we need spiritual water, such as can reach the soul, and the powers of it. Accordingly there is in and by Christ Jesus the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost. And this was intimated to the apostles by our Lord when he washed their feet, and said to Peter, that refused it, "Except I wash thee, thou hast no part in me." Outwardly [or relatively] by the guilt and condemning power of sin upon our persons. By this we are separated from God, and banished from his favourable, gracious, beatific presence for ever. From this we must be purged by atoning blood. It is the law, or determination, in the court of heaven, that "without shedding of blood there shall be no remission." Heb. ix. 22. The Saviour from sin, therefore, must come with blood.

2. Both these ways of cleansing were represented in the old ceremonial institutions of God. Persons and things must be purified by water and blood; "There were divers washings and carnal ordinances imposed till the time of reformation," Heb. ix. 10. "The ashes of an heifer," mixed with water, "sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh," Heb. ix. 13. Num. xix. 9. and likewise, "Almost all things are, by the law, purged with blood," Heb. ix. 22. As these shew us our double defilement, so they indicate the Saviour's twofold purgation.

3. At and upon the death of Jesus Christ, his side being pierced with a soldier's spear, out of the wound there immediately issued water and blood. This the beloved apostle saw, and seems to be affected with the sight; and he alone records it, and seems to reckon himself obliged to record it, as containing something mysterious in it. "And he that saw it bare record, and his record is true; and he knoweth" (being an eyewitness) "that he saith true, that ye might believe," and that ye may believe this particularly, that out of his pierced side "forthwith there came water and blood." Jno. xix. 34, 35. Now this water and blood are comprehensive of all that is necessary and effectual to our salvation. By the water our souls are washed and purified for heaven and the region of saints in light; by the blood God is glorified, his law is honoured, and his vindictive excellencies illustrated and displayed. "Whom God hath set forth," or purposed or proposed, "a propitiation through faith in his blood," or a propitiation in or by his blood through faith, "to declare his righteousness, that he may be just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus," Rom. iii. 25, 26. By the blood we are justified, reconciled, and presented righteous to God; by the blood the curse of the law being satisfied, the purifying spirit is obtained for the internal ablation of our natures. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles, that we might receive the promise of the Spirit" (the promised Spirit) "through faith," Gal. iii. 13, &c. The water as well as the blood issued out of the side of the sacrificed Redeemer.

[Not by water only, but by water and blood, is an essential principle of experimental religion. There is no sanctification to be experienced but in connexion with the previous pardon of sin and purging of the conscience from dead works, through the pleaded and applied blood of Christ. And the sanctifying influence, not less than the pardoning mercy, is procured to us by his atonement. The blood of Jesus cleanse us from all sin. All life flows in a deep-stained stream from his once lifeless heart; in other words, from his accomplished sacrificial death.]

The water and the blood, then, comprehend all things that can be requisite to our salvation; they will consecrate and sanctify to that purpose all that God shall appoint or make use of in order to that great end. "He loved the church, and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church," Eph. v. 25-27. He that comes by water and blood is a perfect Saviour; and this is he that comes by water and blood, even Jesus Christ. Thus we see in what way and manner he comes. But see we his credentials also:—

Secondly. In the witness that attends him, and that is, the Divine Spirit; that Spirit to whom the perfecting of the works of God is usually attributed: "And it is" [or was] "the Spirit that beareth" [or bare] "witness," ver. 6. It was meet that the commissioned Saviour of the world should have a constant agent to support his work, and testify him to the world. It was meet a Divine power should attend him, his Gospel and servants, and notify to the world upon what errand and office they came, and by what authority they were sent; and this was done in and by the Spirit of God, according to the Saviour's own prediction, "He shall glorify me," even when I shall be rejected and crucified by men, "for he shall receive" or take, "of mine." He shall not receive of mine, shall proceed on the foundation I have laid, shall take up my institution, and truth, and cause, "and shall" farther "shew it unto you," and by you to the world, Jno. xvi. 14. And then the apostle adds the commendation or the acceptableness of this witness; "Because the Spirit is truth," ver. 6. He is the Spirit of God, and cannot lie. There is a copy that would afford us a very suitable reading, thus, 'Because,' or that, 'Christ is the truth.' And so it indicates the matter of the Spirit's testimony, the thing which he attests, and that is the truth of Christ. "And it is the Spirit that beareth witness" that Christ is the truth, and consequently that Christianity, or the Christian religion, is the truth of the day, the truth of God. But it is not meet that one or two copies should alter the text; and our present reading is very agreeable, and so we retain it. "The Spirit is truth;" he is indeed the Spirit of truth, Jno. xiv. 17. And that the Spirit is truth, and a witness worthy of all acceptance, appears in that he is a heavenly witness, or one of the witnesses, that in and from heaven bear testimony concerning the truth and authority of Christ. "Because," or for, "there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." And so the 7th verse most appositely occurs as a proof of the authenticity of the Spirit's testimony. He must needs be true, or even truth itself, if he be not only a witness in heaven, but even one (not in testimony only, for so an angel may be, but in being and essence) with the Father and the Word.

But here we are stopped in our course by the contest there is about the genuineness of the 7th verse. It is alleged that many old Greek manuscripts have it not. We shall not here enter into the controversy. It should seem that the critics are not agreed what manuscripts have it, and what not; nor do they sufficiently inform us of the integrity and value of the manuscripts they peruse. Some may be so faulty (as I have an old printed Greek Testament so full of errata) that one would think no critic would establish a various lection thereupon. But let the judicious collators of copies manage that business. There are some rational surmises that seem to support the present text and reading; as,

1. If we admit the 8th verse in the room of the 7th, it looks too like tautology and repetition of what was included in the 6th; "This is he that came by water and blood, not by water only, but by water and blood; and it is the Spirit that beareth witness; for there are three that bear witness, the Spirit, the water, and the blood." This does not assign near so noble an introduction of these three witnesses as our present reading does.

2. It is observed that many copies read that distinctive clause, 'upon the earth,' 'there are three that bear record upon the earth.' Now this bears a visible opposition to some witness or witnesses elsewhere; and therefore we are told by the adversaries of the text that this clause must be supposed to be omitted in most books that want the 7th. But it should, for the same reason, be so in all. Take we the 6th verse, "This is he that came by water and blood; and it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth." It would not now naturally and properly be added, "for there are three that bear record on earth," unless we would suppose that the apostle would tell us that all the witnesses are such as are on earth, when yet he would assure us that one is infallibly true, or even truth itself.

3. It is observed that there is variety of reading even in the Greek text, as in the 7th verse. Some copies read ἐν αἵματι, 'are one;' others, at least the Complutensian, ἐν τῷ αἵματι, 'are to one,' or 'agree in one;' and in ver. 8, in that part that it is supposed should be admitted, instead of the common ἐν τῷ γῆ, 'on earth,' the Complutensian reads, ἐν τῇ γῆ, which seems to shew that that edition depended upon some Greek authority, and not merely, as some would have us believe, upon the authority either of the vulgar Latin, or of Thomas Aquinas, though his to 'imony may be added thereto.

4. The 7th verse is very agreeable to the style and the theology of our apostle, as

1st. He delights in the title, "the Father;" whether he indicates thereby God only, or a Divine Person distinguished from the Son. "I and the Father are one." "And yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me." "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter." "If a y man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." "Grace be with you, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father," 2 Jno. 8. Then,

2nd. The name, "the Word," is known to be almost, if not quite, peculiar to this apostle. Had the text been devised by another, it had been more easy and obvious, from the form of baptism and the common language of the church, to have used the name Son in stead of that of "the Word." As it is observed that Tertullian and Cyprian use that name, even when they refer to this verse; or it is made an object on against their referring to this verse, because they speak of the Son, not the Word; and yet Cyprian's expression seems to be very clear by the citation of Facundus himself: Quod Johannis apostoli testimonium beatus Cyprianus, Carthaginensis antistes et martyr, in epistola suo libro, quem de Trinitate scripsit, de Patre, Filio, et Spiritu sancto dictum intelligit; ait enim, Dicit Dominus, ego et Pater unum sumus; et iterum de Patre, Filio, et Spiritu sancto scriptum est, et hi tres unum sunt. Blessed Cyprian, the Carthaginian bishop and martyr, in the epistle or book he wrote concerning the Trinity, considered the testimony of the apostle John as relating to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; for he says, The Lord says, I and the Father are one; and again of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit it is written, And they three are one. Now, it is nowhere written that these are one but in the 7th verse. It is probable, then, that St. Cyprian, either depending on his memory, or rather intending things more than words, persons more than names, or calling persons by their names more usual in the church, both in popular and polemic discourses, called the second by the name of the Son rather than of "the Word." If any man can admit Facundus's fancy, namely, that St. Cyprian meant that the Spirit, the water and the blood, were indeed the Father, Word and Spirit that St. John said were one, he may enjoy his opinion to himself. For, First. He must suppose that Cyprian not only changed all the names, but the apostle's order too. For the blood, the Son, which Cyprian puts second, the apostle puts last. And, Secondly. He must suppose that Cyprian thought that by the blood which issued out of the side of the Son, the apostle intended the Son himself, who might as well have been denoted by the water; that by the water, which also issued from the side of the Son, the apostle intended the Person of the Holy Ghost; that by the Spirit (which in ver. 6 is said to be truth, and in the Gospel is called the Spirit of truth), the apostle meant the Person of the Father, though he is nowhere else so called, when joined with the Son and the Holy Ghost; which had need of good proof that the Carthaginian father could so understand the apostle. And he that so understands him must believe too that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are said to be three witnesses on earth. Thirdly. Facundus acknowledges that St. Cyprian says, that of his three it is written, Et hi tres unum sunt. "And these three are one." Now, these are the words not of the 8th, but of the 7th verse. Not used concerning the three on earth, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, but the three in heaven, the Father, and the Word,

v. 4. "For:" introducing the reason why God's commandments are not grievous; for he who is born of God prevails over the spirit of disobedience, and shall obtain final and complete victory. The great weapon in this warfare is faith, and this faith prevails because it brings us into union with Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

v. 6. "Came by water and blood:" referring to the baptism and death of Christ. By an emphatic repetition St. John impresses upon his readers that the baptism of Christ was more than one of water.

"It is the Spirit," &c.: the Holy Spirit is an additional witness, besides the water and the blood, to the Messiahship of Jesus (see verse 8); and the force of the Spirit's testimony is in this, that he is truth.

v. 7. "The words, 'in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one; and there are three that bear witness in earth,' are omitted by all Greek MSS. (till the sixteenth century), all the Greek fathers, and the ancient versions, and most and the Holy Ghost. So we are told that the author of the book, De Baptismo Hæreticorum (allowed to be contemporary with Cyprian) cites St. John's words, agreeably to the Greek manuscripts and the ancient versions, thus:—At enim Johannes de Domino nostro in epistola nos docens, hic est qui venit per aquam et sanguinem. Jesus Christus, non in aqua tantum, sed in aqua et sanguine; et Spiritus est qui testimonium perhibet, quia Spiritus est veritas; quia tres testimonium perhibent, Spiritus et aqua et sanguis, et isti tres in unum sunt.—For John, in his epistle, says, concerning our Lord, This is he, Jesus Christ, who came by water and blood, not in water only, but in water and blood; and it is the Spirit that bears witness, because the Spirit is truth; for there are three that bear witness, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one.* If all the Greek manuscripts and ancient versions say concerning the Spirit, the water, and the blood, that, in unum sunt,—they agree in one; then it was not of them that Cyprian spake, whatever variety there might be in the copies in his time, when he said it is written, unum sunt,—they are one.† And therefore Cyprian's words seem still to be a firm testimony to the 7th verse, and an intimation, likewise, that a forger of the text would have scarce so exactly hit upon the apostolical name for the second witness in heaven, "the Word." [Thus much for the Father and the Word.] Then,

3rd. As this apostle only records the history of the water and blood flowing out of the Saviour's side, so it is he only, or he principally, that registers to us the Saviour's promise and prediction of the Holy Spirit's coming to glorify him, and to testify of him, and to convince the world of its own unbelief, and of his righteousness, as in his Gospel, Jno. xiv. 16, 17, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7—15. It is most suitable, then, to the dictation and to the Gospel of this apostle thus to mention the Holy Ghost [also] as a witness for Jesus Christ. Then, [as a fifth general reason in favour of the disputed verse,]

5. It was far more easy for a transcriber, by turning away his eye, or by the obscurity of the copy, it being obliterated or defaced in the top or bottom of a page, or worn away in such materials as the ancients had to write upon, to lose and omit the passage, than for an interpolator to devise and insert it; he must be very bold and impudent that could hope to escape detection and shame, and profane, too, that durst venture to make an addition to a supposed sacred book. And,

6. It can scarce be supposed that when the apostle is representing the strength of the Christian's faith in overcoming the world, and the foundation it relies upon in adhering to Jesus Christ, and the various testimony that was given to Jesus Christ in the world, he should omit the supreme testimony that attended him, especially when we consider that he meant to infer, (as he does ver. 9,) "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater; for this" (that he had rehearsed before) "is the witness of God, which he hath testified of his Son." Now, in the three witnesses on earth, there is neither all the witnesses of God, nor indeed any witness that is truly and immediately God. The antitrinitarian opposers of the text will deny that either the Spirit or the water or the blood are God himself; and others may say that the Spirit here is some created effect of God. But upon our present reading here is a noble enumeration of the several witnesses and testimonies supporting the truth of the Lord Jesus, and the Divinity of his institution. Here is the most excellent abridgment or breviate of the motives to faith in Christ, of the credentials the Saviour brings with him, of the evidences of our Christianity, that is to be found, I think, in the Book of God, upon which single account, even waiving the doctrine of the Divine Trinity, the entire text is worthy of all acceptance.

Having these rational grounds on our side, we proceed.

Thirdly. The apostle having told us that the Spirit that bears witness to Christ is truth, shews us that he is so by assuring us that he is in heaven, and that there are others also, who cannot but be true, or truth itself, concurring in testimony with him; and "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one," ver. 7.

The first that occurs in order is, "the Father." He set his seal to the commission of the Lord Christ, all the while he was here, more especially, 1st. In proclaiming him at his baptism, Mat. iii. 17. Then, 2nd. In confirming his character at the transfiguration, Mat. xvi. 5. Then, 3rd. In accompanying him with miraculous power and works; "If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not; but if I do, though ye believe not me, believe the works, that ye may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him, Jno. x. 37, 38, 41. In avouching at his death, Mat. xxvii. 54. 5th. In raising him from the dead, and receiving him up to his glory. He shall convince the world "of righteousness, because I go to my Father, and ye see me no more," Jno. xvi. 10, and Rom. i. 4.

The second witness is, "the Word." A mysterious name! importing the highest nature that belongs to the Saviour Jesus Christ, that wherein he existed before the world was, and whereby he made the world, and whereby he was truly God with the Father. He [in this Divine nature as the Son] must bear witness to the human nature, or to the man Christ Jesus, in and by whom he redeemed and saved us; and he bore witness, 1st. By the mighty works that he wrought; Jno. v. 17, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." 2nd. In conferring a glory upon him at his transfiguration: "And we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father," Jno. i. 14. 3rd. In raising him from the dead; Jno. ii. 19, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up."

The third witness is the Holy Ghost, or the Holy Spirit, an august, venerable name,—the possessor, proprietor, and author of holiness. True and faithful must he be to whom the Spirit of holiness sets his seal and solemn testimony. So he did to the Lord Jesus, the head of the Christian world, and that in such instances as these, 1st. In the miraculous production of his immaculate human nature in the virgin's womb: "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee," Luk. i. 35, &c. 2nd. In the visible descent upon him at his baptism. The Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, Luk. iii. 22, &c. 3rd. In an effectual conquest of the spirits of hell and darkness: "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you," Mat. xii. 28. 4th. In the visible, potent descent upon the apostles to furnish them with gifts and powers to preach him and his Gospel to the world, after he himself was gone to heaven, Acts. i. 4, 5; ii. 2—4, &c. 5th. In supporting the name, Gospel, and interest of Christ, by miraculous gifts and operations, by and upon the disciples, and in the churches, for two hundred years, 1 Cor. xii. 7; concerning which see Dr. Whitby's excellent discourse in the preface to the second volume of his Commentary on the New Testament. These are witnesses in heaven; and they bear record from heaven; and they are one, it should seem, not only in testimony, for that is implied in their being three witnesses, that is, to one and the same thing, but upon a higher account, as they are in heaven; they are one in their heavenly being and essence; and if one with the Father, they must be one God. Then,

2. To these there is opposed, though with them conjoined, a Trinity of witnesses on earth, such as continue here below: "And there are three that bear witness on earth, the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one," ver. 8.

Of these witnesses the first is, "the Spirit." This must be distinguished of the Latin fathers" (Alford). Read, therefore, verses 7, 8 thus: "For they that bear witness are three—the Spirit, and the water, and the blood: and the three agree in one."

v. 9. Read latter clause thus: "The testimony of God is this, that he hath borne testimony concerning his Son."

v. 10. "Hath the witness in himself;" he in whom the testimony of God has produced faith in Christ has in that very faith a testimony in himself (see 1 Cor. xii. 3), where the apostle ascribes from the Person of the Holy Ghost, who is in heaven. We must say, then, with the Saviour, according to what is reported by this apostle, "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit," Jno. iii. 6. The disciples of the Saviour are, as well as others, born after the flesh; they come into the world endued with a corrupt, carnal disposition, which is enmity to God. This disposition must be mortified and abolished; a new nature must be communicated, old lusts and corruptions must be eradicated, and the true disciple become a new creature. The regeneration and renovation of souls [by the Spirit] is a testimony to the Saviour [as is also, and most emphatically, his bearing witness within our spirits that we are the accepted children of God by faith in Christ Jesus]. It is his actual, though initial, salvation. It is a testimony on earth, because it continues with the church there, and is not performed in that conspicuous, astonishing manner in which signs from heaven are accomplished. To this Spirit belong, not only the regeneration and conversion of the church, but her progressive sanctification, victory over the world, her peace, and love, and joy, and all that grace by which she is made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light. [We have no doubt, however, that (whatever the meaning of the same term in ver. 6) "the Spirit" in this place stands for the Word of truth which he inspired, and by and in which he in all ages bears outward testimony to Jesus as the Christ, and to Christ as our life. So, in this connection, "the water and the blood" denote respectively baptism and the Lord's supper, and nothing more; and it is observable that the express word takes precedence of the sacramental signs. But there is no space for further suggestions on the subject of these various witnesses.]

Then the second is, "the water." This was before considered as a means of salvation, now as a testimony to the Saviour himself, and intimates his purity and purifying power. And so it seems to comprehend, 1st. The purity of his own nature and conduct in the world. He was "holy, harmless, and undefiled." 2nd. The testimony of John's baptism, who bore witness of him, and prepared a people for him, and referred them unto him, Mar. i. 4, 7, 8. 3rd. The purity of his own doctrine, by which souls are purified and washed. "Now ye are clean through the word that I have spoken unto you," Jno. xv. 3. 4th. The actual and active purity and holiness of his disciples. His body is the holy catholic church. "Seeing you have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit," 1 Pet. i. 22. And this signed and sealed by 5th. The baptism that he has appointed for the initiation or introduction of his disciples, in which he signally, or by that sign, says, "Except I wash thee, thou hast no part in me. Not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God," 1 Pet. iii. 21.

Then there is, thirdly, "the blood." This he shed, and this was our ransom. This testifies for Jesus Christ, 1st. In that it sealed up and finished the sacrifices of the Old Testament; "Christ our passover was sacrificed for us." 2nd. In that it confirmed his own predictions, and the truth of all his ministry and doctrine, Jno. xviii. 37. 3rd. In that it shewed unparalleled love to God, in that he would die a sacrifice to his honour and glory, in making atonement for the sins of the world, Jno. xiv. 30, 31. 4th. In that it demonstrated unspeakable love to us; and none will deceive those whom they entirely love, Jno. xiv. 13—15. 5th. In that it demonstrated the disinterestedness of the Lord Jesus, as to any secular interest and advantage. No impostor or deceiver ever proposes to himself contempt, and violent cruel death, Jno. xviii. 36. 6th. In that it lays obligation on his disciples to suffer and die for him. No deceiver would invite proselytes to his side and interest at the rate that the Lord Jesus did; "Ye shall be hated of all men for my sake. They shall put ye out of their synagogues;" and "the time comes, that whosoever kills you will think that he doth God service," Jno. xvi. 2. And he frequently calls his servants to a conformity with him in sufferings; "Let us go forth, therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach," Heb. xiii. 13, which shews that neither he nor his kingdom is of this world. Then, 7th. The benefits accruing and procured by his blood, well understood, must immediately demonstrate that he is indeed the Saviour of the world. And then, 8th. These are signified and sealed in the institution of his own supper: "This is my blood of the New Testament," (which ratifies the New Testament,) "which is shed for many for the remission of sins," Mat. xxvi. 28. Such are the witnesses on earth; such is the various testimony given to the Author of our religion. No wonder if the rejecter of all this evidence be judged as a blasphemer of the Spirit of God, and be left to perish without remedy in his sins. These three witnesses, being more different than the three former, are not so properly said to be one as to be for one,—to be for one and the same purpose and cause, or to agree in one,—in one and the same thing among themselves, and in the same testimony with those that bear record from heaven. [Besides, the three witnesses on earth are mere things, and may more properly be said to agree in one; the three witnesses in heaven are Divine Persons, and essentially are One.] Whereupon,

Fourthly. The apostle justly concludes, "If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater; for this is the witness of God that he hath testified of his Son," ver. 9. Where we have,

1. A supposition well founded upon the premises. Here is the witness of God, the witness whereby God hath testified of his Son, which surely must intimate some immediate, irrefragable testimony, and that of the Father concerning his Son; he has by himself proclaimed and avouched him to the world.

2. The authority and acceptableness of this testimony, and that argued from the less to the greater: "If we receive the witness of men, and such testimony is and must be admitted in all judicatories, and in all nations, 'the witness of God is greater.' It is truth itself, of highest authority, and most unquestionable infallibility. And then there is,

3. The application of the rule to the present case; "For this is the witness," and here is the witness, "of God," even of the Father as well as of the Word and Spirit, "which he hath testified of," and wherein he hath attested, "his Son." God, that cannot lie, hath given sufficient assurance to the world that Jesus Christ is his Son, the Son of his love, and Son by office, to reconcile and recover the world unto himself; he testified therefore the truth and Divine original of the Christian religion; and that it is the sure appointed way and means of bringing us up to God.

10 He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son. 11 And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. 12 He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. 13 These things have I written unto you that believe on

v. 12. On this verse Bengel remarks that it has two clauses: in the former the Son is mentioned without the addition "of God," for believers know the Son; in the second clause the addition "of God" is made, that unbelievers may know thereby what a serious thing it is not to love him: and that in the former clause "hath" bears the emphasis, in the second "life." Faith is the means whereby Christ the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

First. The privilege and stability of the real Christian: "He that believeth on the Son of God," hath been prevailed with unfeignedly to cleave to him for salvation, "hath the witness in himself," ver. 10. He hath not only the outward evidence that others have, but he hath in his own heart a testimony for Jesus Christ. He can allege what Christ and the truth of Christ have done for his soul, and what he has seen and found in him. As, 1. He has deeply seen his sin, and guilt, and misery, and his abundant need of such a Saviour. 2. He has seen the excellency, beauty, and office of the Son of God, and the incomparable suitability of such a Saviour to all his spiritual wants and sorrowful circumstances. 3. He sees and admires the wisdom and love of God in preparing and sending such a Saviour to deliver him from sin and hell, and to raise him to pardon, peace, and communion with God. 4. He hath found and felt the power of the word and doctrine of Christ, wounding, humbling, healing, quickening and comforting his soul. 5. He finds that the revelation of Christ, as it is the greatest discovery and demonstration of the love of God, so it is the most apt and powerful means of kindling, fomenting, and inflaming love to the holy blessed God. 6. He is born of God by the truth of Christ, as ver. 1. He hath a new heart and nature,—a new love, disposition, and delight, and is not the man that formerly he was. 7. He finds yet such a conflict with himself, with sin, with the flesh, the world, and invisible wicked powers, as is described and provided for in the doctrine of Christ. 8. He finds such prospects and such strength afforded him by the faith of Christ, that he can despise and overcome the [present] world, and travel on towards a better. 9. He finds what interest the Mediator hath in heaven, by the audience and prevalence of those prayers that are sent thither in his name, according to his will, and through his intercession. 10. He is begotten again unto a lively hope, to a holy confidence in God, in his goodwill and love, to a pleasant victory over terrors of conscience, dread of death and hell, to a comfortable prospect of life and immortality, being enriched with the earnest of the Spirit, and sealed to the day of redemption. Such assurance has "he gospel believer,"—he has a witness in himself. Christ is formed in him, and is growing up to the fulness and perfection (or perfect image) of Christ in heaven.

Secondly. The aggravation of the unbeliever's sin,—the sin of unbelief: "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar." He does in effect give God the lie; "Because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son," ver. 10. He must believe either that God did not send his Son into the world, when he has given us such manifold evidence that he did; or, that Jesus Christ was not the Son of God, when all that evidence relates to, and terminates upon, him; or, that he sent his Son to deceive the world, and to lead it into error and misery; or, that he permits men to devise a religion, which, in all the parts of it, is a pure, holy, heavenly, undefiled institution, and so worthy to be embraced by the reason of mankind, and yet is but a delusion and a lie; and then lends them his Spirit and power to recommend and obtrude it upon the world; which is to make God the father, that is, the author or abettor, of the lie.

[Note, in passing, a threefold object placed before us within this one verse, ver. 10, whereto saving faith must necessarily have respect. It must "believe God," firmly basing itself on his essential rectitude and benevolence; it must consequently "believe the record that God gave of his Son," feeling it to be infallible and faithful as his nature; and it must thereupon "believe on the Son of God," leaning the soul's whole weight on his cross, and expecting "eternal life" in "fellowship with" him.]

Thirdly. The matter, the substance, or contents of all this Divine testimony concerning Jesus Christ; "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is in his Son," ver. 11. This is the sum of the Gospel. This is the sum and epitome of the whole record given us by all the aforesaid six witnesses.

1. That "God hath given to us eternal life." He hath designed it for us in his eternal purpose; he hath prepared all the means that are necessary to bring us thither; he hath made it over to us by his covenant and promise; and he actually confers a right and title thereto, on all that believe on, and actually embrace, the Son of God. Then,

2. This life is in the Son. The Son is life, eternal life in his own essence and person, John i. 4; 1 John i. 2. He is eternal life to us, the spring of our spiritual and glorious life, Col. iii. 4. From him life is communicated to us, both here and in heaven; and thereupon it must follow, 1st. "He that hath the Son hath life," ver. 12. He that is united to the Son is united to life; he that hath title to the Son hath title to life, to eternal life. Such honour hath the Father put upon the Son. Such honour must we put upon him too. We must come and kiss the Son, and we shall have life. 2nd. "He that hath not the Son of God hath not life," ver. 12. He continues under the condemnation of the law, John iii. 36. He refuses the Son, who is life itself, who is the procurer of life, and the way to it; he provokes God to deliver him over to endless death, for making him a liar, since he believes not this record that God has given concerning his Son.

Fourthly. The end and reason of the apostle's preaching this to believers.

1. For their satisfaction and comfort: "These things have I written unto you, that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life," ver. 13. Upon all this evidence, and these witnesses, it is but just and meet that there should be those that believe on the name of the Son of God. God increase their number! How much testimony from heaven has the world to answer for! And to three witnesses in heaven must the world be accountable. These believers have eternal life; they have it in the covenant of the Gospel, in the beginning and first-fruits of it within them, and in their Lord and Head in heaven. These believers may come to know that they have eternal life, and should be quickened, encouraged, and comforted in the prospect of it; and they should value the Scriptures, that are so much written for their consolation and salvation.

2. For their confirmation and progress in their holy faith: "And that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God," ver. 13; that is, may go on believing, [strengthened by what you have now heard from me.] Believers must persevere, or they do nothing. To withdraw from believing on the name of the Son of God is to renounce eternal life, and to draw back unto perdition. And therefore the evidences of religion, and the advantage of faith, are to be presented to believers, in order to narten and encourage them to persevere to the end.

14 And this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us: 15 And if we know that he hear us, becomes a present possession; and having him is to have life, in its germ and reality now, and its fully-developed manifestation hereafter.

v. 13. Omit the words "that believe on the name of the Son of God" in the first clause (they are wanting in the oldest MSS.), and read the rest of the verse thus: "That ye may know that ye have eternal life, even to you that believe on the name of the Son of God." Great stress is to be laid on the words "ye know." The phrase "we whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him. 16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it. 17 All unrighteousness is sin: and there is a sin not unto death.

Here we see, First. A privilege belonging to faith in Christ; and that is, audience in prayer; "And this is the confidence that we have in him, that if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us," ver. 14. The Lord Christ emboldens us to come to God in all circumstances, with all our supplications and requests; and through him our petitions are admitted and accepted of God. The matter of our prayer must be agreeable to the declared will of God. It is not fit that we should ask what is contrary either to his majesty and glory, or to our own good, who are his, and dependent on him. And then we may have confidence that the prayer of faith shall be heard in heaven.

Secondly. The advantage accruing to us by such privilege; "And if we know that he heareth us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him," ver. 15. Great are the deliverances, mercies, and blessings the holy petitioner needs. To know that his petitions are heard, or accepted, is as good as to know that they are answered; and therefore that he is so pitied, pardoned, counselled, sanctified, assisted, and saved, or shall be so, as he is allowed to ask of God.

Thirdly. Direction in prayer in reference to the sins of others; "If any man see his brother sin a sin, which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death: There is a sin unto death; I do not say that he shall pray for it," ver. 16. Where we may observe,

1. That we ought to pray for others, as well as for ourselves; for our brethren of mankind, that they may be enlightened, converted, and saved; for our brethren in the Christian profession, that they may be sincere, and may be pardoned their sins, delivered from evils and the chastisements of God, and preserved in Christ Jesus.

2. That there is great distinction in the heinousness and guilt of sin. There is "a sin unto death," ver. 16, and "there is a sin not unto death," ver. 17. 1st. There is a sin unto death. All sin, as to the merit and legal sentence of it is unto death; "The wages of sin is death; and cursed is every one that continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law to do them," Gal. iii. 10. But there is sin unto death in opposition to such sin as is here said not to be unto death. There is therefore, 2nd. A sin not unto death. And that surely must be all such sin as by Divine or human constitution may consist with life; in the human constitution with temporal or corporal life; in the Divine constitution with corporal, or with spiritual, evangelical life.

First. There are sins that by human, righteous constitution are not unto death,—as divers pieces of injustice, which may be compensated without the death of the delinquent. In opposition to which there are sins that by righteous constitution are to death, or to a legal forfeiture of life,—such as we call capital crimes. Then, Secondly. There are sins that by Divine constitution are unto death, and that either death corporal, or spiritual and evangelical. 1st. Such as are, or may be, to death corporal. And such may the sins be either of gross hypocrites, as Ananias and Sapphira, or, for aught we know, of sincere Christian brethren; as when the apostle says of the offending members of the church of Corinth, "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep," 1 Cor. xi. 30. There may be sin unto corporal death among those that may not be condemned with the world. Such sin, I said, is, or may be, to corporal death. The Divine, penal constitution in the Gospel does not positively and peremptorily threaten death to the more visible sins of the members of Christ, but only some gospel chastisement; "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth," Heb. xii. 6. There is room left for Divine wisdom or goodness, or even gospel severity, to determine how far the chastisement or the scourge shall proceed; and we cannot say but that sometimes it may, in terrorem,—for warning to others,—proceed even to death. Then, 2nd. There are sins that by Divine constitution are unto death spiritual and evangelical; that is, are inconsistent with spiritual and evangelical life,—with spiritual life in the soul, and with an evangelical right to life above. Such are total impenitence and unbelief for the present; final impenitence and unbelief are infallibly to death eternal; as also a blaspheming of the Spirit of God in the testimony that he has given to Christ and his Gospel, and a total apostasy from the light and convictive evidence of the truth of Christian religion. These are sins deriving the guilt of everlasting death. Then comes,

Fourthly. The application of the direction for prayer, according to the different sorts of sin, thus distinguished. The prayer is supposed to be for life; "He shall ask, and he," God, "shall give them life." Life is to be asked of God; he is God of life, and gives it when and to whom he pleases, and takes it away, either by his constitution, or providence, or both, as he thinks meet. In the case of a brother's sin, that is not, in the manner already mentioned, unto death, we may, in faith and hope, pray for him, and particularly for the life of soul and body. But in case of the sin unto death, in the forementioned ways, we have no allowance to pray. Perhaps the apostle's expression, "I do not say he shall pray for it," may intend no more than, I have no promise for you in that case—no foundation for the prayer of faith.

1. The laws of punitive justice must be executed for the common safety and benefit of mankind. And even an offending brother in such a case must be resigned to public justice, which, in the foundation of it, is Divine, and at the same time also to the mercy of God.

2. The removal of evangelical penalties, as they may be called, or the prevention of death, that may seem to be so consequential upon, or inflicted for, some particular sin, can be prayed for only conditionally or provisionally; that is, with proviso that it consist with the wisdom, will, and glory of God that they should be removed, and particularly such death prevented.

3. We cannot pray that the sins of the impenitent and unbelieving should, while they are such, be forgiven them; or that any mercy of life or soul, that supposes the forgiveness of sin, should be granted to them while they continue such. But we may pray for their repentance, supposing them but in the common case of the impenitent world, and for their being enriched with faith in Christ, and thereupon for all other saving mercies.

4. In case it should appear that any have committed the irremissible blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and the total apostasy from the illuminating convictive powers of the Christian religion, it should seem that they are not to be prayed for at all; for what remains but a certain fearful expectation of judgment, to consume such adversaries? Heb. x. 27. And these last seem to be sins chiefly intended by the apostle by the name of sins unto death. Then, know" occurs no fewer than five times in the succeeding verses. The apostle of love is also the apostle of knowledge. Through him we learn that to know God and his Son is eternal life (John xvii. 3); and he strongly asserts that personal knowledge which gave him a right to speak. (Compare 1 John i. 1.)

v. 14. In the former verse St. John had spoken of their knowing that they had eternal life. From that knowledge would result the confidence in prayer here mentioned. The "him" and "his will"

5. The apostle seems to argue that there is sin that is not unto death; thus, "All unrighteousness is sin," ver. 17. But were all unrighteousness unto death, since we have all some unrighteousness towards God or man, or both, in omitting and neglecting something that is our duty, then we were all peremptorily bound over to death; but since it is not so, the Christian brethren, generally speaking, having right to life, there must be sin that is not unto death. Though there is not venial sin, in the common acceptance, there is pardoned sin—sin that does not derive a plenary obligation to eternal death. If it were not so there could be no justification or continuance of the justified state. The gospel constitution or covenant abbreviates, abridges, or rescinds the guilt of sin.

[Surely too much of mystery has been thrown over the meaning of these two verses. Do they not relate to the same class of cases as those provided for by the Holy Ghost in the close of St. James's epistle, ch. v. 14-16? Is not the emergency supposed an extraordinary one, somewhat abruptly introduced to illustrate and magnify the power of prayer, on the part of eminently righteous and believing men? Is it not simply that of some urgent bodily sickness, occasioned proximately by some presumptuous sin? Is not the offender an unsaved, or rather a backsliding, member of the church? ("If any man" of you "see his brother sin a sin," &c. "Is any among you sick? and if he have committed sins," &c. "Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth," &c.) Is not the power of obtaining spared life for such an one, though doubtless encouraging to devout men in all times,—yet granted here, properly, to men rich in the supernatural gifts of the apostolic age, the gifts of discernment, healing, and prayer? (Jas. v. 16, the "inwrought," or inspired, "prayer of a righteous man availeth much.") Is not the excepted case that of one whose sin is inevitably unto bodily death; inevitably, either because it is not confessed or repented of, Jas. v. 16, or because it has been of a peculiarly grievous character, perhaps some death-working "lust of the flesh?" In such a case, would not spiritually-gifted men find themselves wanting in the inwrought prayer of faith, and be rather restrained from "asking life?" And yet, does not St. James, while extending the injunction and promise to the exigency of all sick brethren, whether suffering for sin or not, give encouragement to hope that, even where life is irrecoverably forfeited, the soul may by counsel and intercession be converted and saved eternally? ch. v. 19, 20.]

18 We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not; but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not. 19 And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness. 20 And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life. 21 Little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen.

GREEK AND ROMAN IDOLS.

Here we have, First, A recapitulation of the privileges and advantages of the sound Christian believers.

1. They are secured against sin, against the fulness of its dominion or the fulness of its guilt: "We know that whosoever is born of God," and the believer in Christ is born of God, ver. 1. "sinneth not," ver. 18; sinneth not with that fulness of heart and spirit as the unregenerate do; as was said, ch. iii. 6, 9, and, consequently, not with that fulness of guilt that attends the sins of others; and so he is secured against that sin that is unavoidably unto death, or that infallibly binds the sinner over unto the wages of eternal death. The new nature, and the inhabitation of the Divine Spirit, thereby prevent the admission of such unpardonable sin.

2. They are fortified against the devil's destructive attempts; "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself," that is, is enabled to guard himself, "and the wicked one touches him not," ver. 18; that is, that the wicked one may not touch him, namely to death. It seems not to be barely a narration of the duty or the practice of the regenerate, but an indication of their power by virtue of their regeneration; they are thereby prepared and principled against the fatal touches (that is, the sting) of the wicked one. He touches not their souls to infuse that venom there that he does to others; or to expel that regenerative principle that is an antidote to his poison; or to induce them to that sin that by gospel constitution conveys an indissoluble obligation to eternal death. He may prevail too far with them to draw them to some acts of sin; but it seems to be the design of the apostle to assert that their regeneration secures them from such assaults of the devil as will bring them into the same case and actual condemnation with the devil.

3. They are on God's side and interest, in opposition to the state of the world; "And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness," ver. 19. Mankind is divided into two great parties or dominions; that which belongs to God, and that which belongs to wickedness, or to the wicked one. The Christian believers belong to God. They are of God, and from him, and to him, and for him. They succeed into the right and room of the ancient Israel of God, of whom it is said, "The Lord's people is his portion," his estate in this world, "Jacob is the lot of his inheritance," the dividend that has fallen to him by the lot of his own determination, Deu. xxxii. 9. While, on the contrary, "the whole world," the rest being by far the major part, "lieth in wickedness," in the jaws, in the bowels of the wicked one. There are, indeed, were we to consider the individuals, many wicked ones; many wicked spirits in the heavenly, or the ethereal, places; but they are united in wicked nature, policy, and principle, and they are united also in one head. There is the prince of the devils and of the diabolical kingdom. There is a head of the malignity and of the malignant world; and he has such sway here that he is called the god of this world. Strange that such a knowing spirit should be so implacably incensed against the Almighty and all his interests, when he cannot but know that it must end in his own overthrow and everlasting damnation! How tremendous is the judgment of God upon that wicked one! May the God of the Christian world continually demolish his dominion in this world, and translate souls into the kingdom of his dear Son!

4. They are enlightened in the knowledge of the true, eternal God; "And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true," ver. 20. The Son of God is come into our world; and we have seen him, and know him by all the evidence that has already been asserted; and he hath revealed unto us the true God, as Jno. i. 18; and he hath opened our minds, too, to understand that revelation; given us an internal light in our understandings, whereby we may discern the glories of the true God; and we are assured that it is the true God that he hath discovered to us. He is infinitely transcendent in purity, power, and perfection, to all the gods of the Gentiles. He has all the excellencies, beauties, and riches of the living and true God. It is the same God that, according to Moses' account, made the heavens and the earth; the same that took our fathers, the patriarchs, into peculiar covenant with himself; the same that brought our ancestors out of Egypt; that gave us the fiery law upon mount Sinai; that gave us his holy oracles, and promised the call and conversion of the Gentiles. By his counsels and works, by his love and grace, by his terrors and judgments, we know that he, and he alone, in the fulness of his being, is the living and true God. It is a great happiness to know the true God, to know him in Christ; it is eternal life, Jno. xvii. 3. It is the glory of the Christian revelation that it gives the best account of the true God, and administers the best eye-salve for our discerning the living and true God.

5. They have a happy union with God and his Son: "And we are in him that is true, even," or and, "in his Son Jesus Christ," ver. 20. The Son leads us to the Father, and we are in both; in the love and favour of both; in covenant and federal alliance with both; in spiritual conjunction with both, by the inhabitation and operation of their Spirit. And that you may know how great a dignity and felicity this is, you must remember that this true one is the true God and eternal life; or rather, as it should seem a more natural construction, this same Son of God is himself also the true God and eternal life, Jno. i. 1, and here, ch. i. 2. So that in union with either much more with both, we are united to the true God and eternal life.

[Without doubt this latter is the true construction. To have said that the true God is the true God, (as some actually read it) would have been an absurdity exactly parallel to that, pointed out at ch. iv. 2, of saying that a certain mere man was born in human nature. The apostle closes the epistle as he opened it, by declaring that "we are in him that is true," the true God, in virtue of our being "in his Son Jesus Christ," ch. i. 3; nay, that this Jesus Christ is himself, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, "the true God, and," both essentially as God and relatively to man, "eternal life." "Dear children," he therefore subjoins, "keep yourselves from idols;" as creatures, from all objects of worship, and as Christians, from all objects of faith, rival to "the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ!" Then we have,

Secondly, The apostle's concluding monition; "Little children," dear children, as it has been interpreted, "keep yourselves from idols," ver. 21. Since ye know the true God, and are in him, let your light and love guard you against all that is advanced in opposition to him, or competition with him. Flee from the false gods of the heathen world; they are not comparable to the God whose you are, and whom you serve. Adore not your God by statues and images, which share in his worship. Your God is an incomprehensible Spirit, and is disgraced by such sordid representations. Hold no communion with your heathen neighbours in their idolatrous worship. Your God is jealous, and would have you come out, and be separated from among them. Mortify the flesh, and be crucified to the world, that they may not usurp the throne and dominion in the heart, which is due only to God. The God whom you have known is he that made you, that redeemed you by his Son, that has sent his Gospel to you, that hath pardoned your sins, and begotten you unto himself by his Spirit, and given you eternal life; cleave to him in faith, and love, and constant obedience, in opposition to all things, brethren, that would alienate your mind and heart from God. To this living and true God be glory and dominion for ever and ever! Amen.

must refer to God the Father. "According to his will:" "The condition here attached is, in fact, no limitation within the reality of the Christian life—i.e., in St. John's way of speaking according to the true ideal. For God's will is that to which our glorious Head himself submitted, and which rules the whole course of the Christian life, for our good and his glory; and he who, in prayer or otherwise, tends against God's will, is thereby and in so far transgressing the bounds of his life in God. (See James iv. 3.) By the continual feeling of submission to his will, joined with continual increase in knowledge of that will, our prayers will be both chastened and directed aright. If we knew his will thoroughly, and submitted to it heartily, it would be impossible for us to ask anything, for the spirit or the body, which he should not hear and perform. And it is this ideal state, as always, which the apostle has in view" (Alford).

v. 16. "He shall give," &c.: i.e., the asker shall give. He shall be the means, by his intercessory prayer, of obtaining from God life for his sinning brother. "I do not say," &c.: Alford considers this as implying a prohibition; other commentators think that St. John is merely excluding the subject which follows from his present teaching. There is a difference between the "ask" and "pray"—the former being used of a humble petition, the latter of the request as of one on an equality, or, at least, on terms of familiarity. Alford says, "To request for a sin unto death (intercede, as it were, authoritatively for it; as though we were more merciful than God) would savour of presumption, prescribing to God how he shall inflict and withhold his righteous judgments." The sin unto death being, according to Bengel, "a state of soul in which faith, love, and hope—in short, the new life—is extinguished."

HERE we find a canonical epistle inscribed principally, not only to a single person, but to one also of the softer sex. And why not to one of that sex? In gospel redemption, privilege, and dignity, there is neither male nor female; they are both one in Christ Jesus. Our Lord himself neglected his own repast to commune with the woman of Samaria, in order to shew her the fountain of life. And, when almost expiring upon the cross, he would, with his dying lips, bequeath his blessed mother to the care of this beloved disciple, and thereby instruct him to respect female disciples for the future. It was to one of the same sex that our Lord chose to appear first after his return from the grave, and to send by her the news of his resurrection to this as well as to the other apostles. And we find afterwards a zealous Priscilla so well acquitting herself in her Christian race, and particularly in some hazardous service towards the apostle Paul, that she is not only often mentioned before her husband, but to her as well as to him, not only the apostle himself, but also all the Gentile churches, were ready to return their thankful acknowledgments. No wonder, then, that an heroine in Christian religion, honoured by Divine Providence, and distinguished by Divine grace, should be dignified also by an apostolical epistle.

[The canonical authority of the second and third epistles of John depends on the following things: 1. On the evidence that they are the writings of the apostle John. In proportion as that evidence is clear, their canonical authority is of course established. 2. Though brief, and though addressed to individuals, they are admitted into the canon of Scripture with the same propriety as the epistles to Timothy, to Titus, and to Philemon, for those were addressed also to individuals. 3. Like those epistles, also, these contain things of general interest to the church. There is nothing in either that is inconsistent with what John has elsewhere written, or that conflicts with any other part of the New Testament; there is much in them that is in the manner of John, and that breathes his spirit; there is enough in them to tell us of the way of salvation. Of the time when these epistles were written, and the place where, nothing is known, and conjecture would be useless, as there are no marks of time or place in either, and there is no historical statement that gives the information. It has been the common opinion that they were written at Ephesus, and when John was old. The appellation which he gives of himself, "the elder," accords with this supposition, though it does not make it absolutely certain.]

The apostle here salutes an honourable matron and her children, ver. 1-4; recommends to them faith and love, ver. 5, 6; warns them of deceivers, ver. 7; and to take heed to themselves, ver. 8; teaches how to treat those that bring not the doctrine of Christ, ver. 10, 11, and referring other things to personal discourse, concludes the epistle, ver. 12, 13.

THE elder unto the elect lady and her children, whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth; 2 For the truth's sake, which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever.

Ancient epistles began, as here, with salutation and good wishes. Religion consecrates, as far as may be, old forms, and turns compliments into real expressions of life and love. Here we have, as usually,

First. The saluter; not expressed by name, but by a chosen character, "the elder." The expression, and style, and love, do intimate that the penman was the same with that of the foregoing epistle. He is now "the elder," emphatically and eminently so; possibly the oldest apostle now living; the chief elder in the church of God. An elder in the ancient house of Israel was revered, or to be revered; much more he that is so in the Gospel-Israel of God. An old disciple is honourable; an old apostle and leader of disciples is more so. He was now old in holy service and experience, had seen and tasted much of heaven, and was much nearer than when at first he believed.

Secondly. The saluted—a noble Christian matron and her children: to "the elect lady and her children." A lady, a person of eminent quality for birth, breeding, and estate. It is well the Gospel has got among such. It is pity but lords and ladies should be acquainted with the Lord Christ and his religion. They owe more to him than others do, though usually "not many noble are called." Here is a pattern for persons of quality of the same sex. "The elect lady;" not only a choice one, but one chosen of God. It is brave to see Divine election running among the ladies; it is lovely and beautiful to see ladies, by holy walking, demonstrate their election of God. "And her children;" probably the lady was a widow. She and her children, then, are the principal part of the family; and so this may be styled an economical epistle. Families may well be written to and encouraged, and further directed in their domestic love, and order, and duties. We see that children may well be taken notice of in Christian letters, and they should know it too; it may avail to their encouragement and caution. They that love and commend them will be apt to inquire after them. This lady and her children are farther notified by the respect paid them, and that, 1. By the apostle himself; "Whom I love in the truth," or in truth; whom I sincerely and heartily love. He that was the beloved disciple had learned the art or exercise of love; and he especially loved those that loved him (the Lord). 2. By all her Christian acquaintance, all the religious that knew her; "And not I only, but also all they that have known the truth." Virtue and goodness, in an elevated sphere, shine bright. Truth demands acknowledgment. They that see the evidences of pure religion should confess and attest them. It is a good sign and great duty to love and value religion in others. Then here is the ground of this love and respect thus paid to this lady and her children; "For the truth's sake," (or true religion's sake,) "which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever." Christian love is founded upon the appearance of Christian, vital religion. Likeness should beget affection. They that love truth and piety in themselves should love it in others too, or love others upon the account of it. The apostle and the other Christians loved this lady, not so much for her honour as her holiness; not so much for her bounty as her serious Christianity. We should not be religious merely by fits and starts, in certain moods and moons, but religion should still dwell within us, in our minds and hearts, in our faith and love. It is to be hoped that where religion once truly dwells it will abide for ever. The spirit of Christianity, we may suppose, will not be totally extinguished; which "shall be with us for ever."

3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love. 4 I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

Here we see,

First. The salutation, which is, indeed, an apostolical benediction; "Grace be with you, mercy and peace, from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of the Father, in truth and love." Sacred love pours out blessings upon this honourable Christian family. To them that have more shall be given. These blessings are craved, 1. "From God the Father," the God of all grace. He is the fountain of blessedness, and of all the blessings that must

* Exposition of II and III John by Rev. John Revnolds. Additional Notes from Barnes.

Introductory Note to 2 and 3 John.—That these epistles were written by the same author appears from their similarity of tone, style, and sentiments. That John, the beloved disciple, was the author of them, as well as of the First Epistle, appears from Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Dionysius of Alexandria, Alexander of Alexandria, and others. From the brevity and private nature of their contents, they were less generally read in the earliest Christian assemblies, and were also less quoted by the Fathers. Hence arose their non-universal recognition at the first. Their private nature makes them less likely to be spurious, for there seems no purpose in their forgery. Their style and colouring, too, accord with the style of the First Epistle. They were probably written by the apostle during his old age, when a resident at Ephesus, to which place he returned after his release from the island of Patmos.

1. "Elder:" literally, "presbyter," from which our English word "priest" is a contraction, and is used in this sense in our Book bring us thither. 2. "From the Lord Jesus Christ." He is also author and communicator of these heavenly blessings; and he is distinguished by this emphatical character, "the Son of the Father." Such a Son as none else can be; such a Son as is the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person, who, with the Father, is also eternal life, 1 Jno. i. 2. From these Divine persons is craved, 1st. Grace; Divine favour and goodwill, the spring of all good things. It is grace, indeed, that any spiritual blessings should be conferred on sinful mortals. 2nd. Mercy; free pardon and forgiveness. They that are already rich in grace have need of continual forgiveness. 3rd. Peace; tranquillity of spirit and serenity of conscience, in an assured reconciliation with God, together with all safe and sanctified outward prosperity. And these are desired "in truth and love;" either by sincere and ardent affection in the sinner, (in faith and love he prays them from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ,) or as productive of continued truth and love in the saluted. These blessings will continually preserve true faith and love in the elect lady and her children,—and may they do so!

Secondly. The congratulation upon the prospect of the exemplary conversation of other children of this excellent lady. Happy parent, that was blessed with such a numerous religious offspring! "I rejoiced greatly, that I found of thy children, walking in the truth, as we have received commandment from the Father." Possibly the lady's sons travelled abroad, either for accomplishment and acquaintance with the world, or on the account of their own business, or the common affairs of the family, and in their travels might come to Ephesus, where the apostle is now supposed to reside, and might there happily converse with him. See how good it is to be trained up to early religion. Though religion is not to be founded upon education, yet education may be and often is blest, and is the way to fortify youth against irreligious infection. And hence let young travellers learn to carry their religion along with them, and not either leave it at home or learn the ill customs of the countries whence they come. It may be observed, also, that sometimes election runs in a direct line. Here is an elect lady and her elect children. Children may be beloved for the parents' sake, but both by virtue of free grace. From the apostle's joy herein we may observe, that it is pleasant to see children treading in good parents' steps; and they that see this may well congratulate the parents thereupon; and that both to excite their thankfulness to God for, and to enlarge their comfort in, so great a blessing. How happy a lady was this, that had brought forth so many children for heaven and for God! And how great a joy must it be to her ladyship to hear so good an account of them from so good a judge! And we may farther see that it is joyful to good old ministers, and accordingly to other good old disciples, to see a hopeful rising generation, that may serve God and support religion in the world when they are dead and gone. We see here also the rule of true walking, the commandment of the Father; then is our walk true, our converse right, when it is managed by the word of God.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another. 6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

We come now more into the design and substance of the epistle; and here we have,

First. The apostle's request; "Now I beseech thee, lady." Considering what it is that he entreats, the way of address is very remarkable. It is not any particular boon or bounty to himself, but common duty and observance of Divine command. Here he might command or charge; but harsher methods are worse than needless where milder will prevail; and the apostolical spirit is, of all other, the most tender and endearing. Whether out of deference to her ladyship, or apostolical meekness, or both, he condescends to beseech; "And now, I beseech thee, lady." He may be supposed speaking as another apostle does to a certain master to whom he writes, "Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ," and according to the power with which Christ hath entrusted me, "to enjoin thee that which is convenient, yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such a one as the aged, the elder." Love will avail where authority will not; and we may often see that the more authority is urged the more it is slighted. The apostolical minister will love and beseech his friends into their duty.

Secondly. The thing requested of the lady and her children—Christian, sacred love; "That we love one another," ver. 5. They that are eminent in any Christian virtue have yet room to grow therein. "But as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you; for ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. But we beseech you, brethren, and sisters, "that ye increase more and more," 1 Thes. iv. 9, 10. This love is, 1. Recommended, 1st. From the obligation thereto; "The commandment." Divine commandment should sway our mind and heart. 2nd. From the antiquity of the obligation; "Not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning," ver. 5. This commandment of mutual Christian love may be said to be a new one, in respect of its new enactment and sanction by the Lord Christ; but yet, as to the matter of it, mutual, holy love, it is as old as natural, Jewish, or Christian religion. This commandment must everywhere attend Christianity, that the disciples of it must love one another. Then this love is, 2. Illustrated from the fruitful nature of it; "And this is love, that we walk after his commandments," ver. 6. This is the test of our love to God, our obedience to him. This is love to ourselves, to our own souls, that we walk in obedience to Divine commands; "In keeping them there is great reward." This is love to one another, to engage one another to walk in holiness; and this is the note of our sincere, mutual, Christian love, that we in other things walk after God's commands. There may be mutual love that is not religious and Christian; but we know ours to be so by our attendance to all other commands besides that of mutual love. Universal obedience is the proof of the goodness and sincerity of Christian virtues; and they that aim at all Christian obedience will, to be sure, attend to Christian love. That is a fundamental duty in the Gospel charter. "This is the commandment, that as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it," ver. 6, that is, walk in this love. The foresight of the decay of this love, as well as of other apostacy, might engage the apostle to inculcate this duty and this primordial command the more frequently, the more earnestly.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist. 8 Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward. 9 Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.

First. In this principal part of the epistle we find, 1. The ill news communicated to the lady. Seducers are abroad: "For many deceivers are entered into the world." This report is introduced by a particle that bespeaks a reason of the report. You have need to maintain your love, for there are destroyers of it in the world; they that subvert the faith destroy the love. The common faith is one ground of the common love; or, you must secure your walk according to the commands of God,—that will secure you. Your stability is like to be tried; "For many deceivers are entered into the world." Sad and saddening news may be communicated to our Christian friends; not that we should love to make them sorry, but to forewarn them is the way to forearm them against their trials. Now here is, 1. The description of the deceiver and his deceit. He confesses not "that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh," ver. 7. He brings some error or other concerning the person of the Lord Jesus. He either confesses not that Jesus Christ is the same person, or that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ, the Anointed of God, the Messiah promised of old for the redemption of Israel; or that the promised Messiah and Redeemer is come in the flesh, or into the flesh, into our world, and into our nature; such an one pretends that he is yet to be expected. Strange, that after such evidence any should deny that the Lord Jesus is the Son of God and Saviour of the world! 2. The aggravation of the case. Such an one "is a deceiver and an antichrist," ver. 7. He deludes souls, and undermines the glory and kingdom of the Lord Christ. He must be an impostor, a wilful deceiver, after all the light that has been afforded, and all the evidence that Christ hath given concerning himself, and the attestation God hath given concerning his Son; and he is a wilful opposer of the person, and honour, and interest of the Lord Christ, and as such shall be reckoned with when the Lord Christ comes again. Let us not think it strange there are deceivers and opposers of the Lord Christ's name and dignity now; there were such of old, even in the apostle's times.

Secondly. The counsel given to this elect household hereupon. Now care and caution is needful; "Look to yourselves," ver. 8. The more deceivers and deceits do abound the more watchful the disciples must be. Delusions may so prevail as that even the elect may be endangered thereby. Two things they must beware of: 1. That they lose not what they had wrought, ver. 8; that is, what they have done, or what they have gained. It is pity that any religious labour should be in vain. Some begin well, but at last lose all their pains. The hopeful gentleman that had kept the commands of the second table, from his youth up, lost all for want of less love to the world and more love to Christ. Nor what they have gained; many have not only gained a fair reputation for religion, but much light therein, much conviction of the evil of sin, the vanity of the world, the excellency of religion, and the power of God's word. They have even tasted of the powers of the world to come, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit, and yet at last lose all. "Ye did run well; who hindered ye, that ye should not obey," or not go on to obey, "the truth?" Sad it is that fair, splendid attainments in the school of Christ should all be lost at last. 2. That they lose not their reward, none of it; no portion of that honour, or praise, or glory, that they once stood fair for. "That we," or ye, as in some copies, "receive a full reward." Secure ye as full a reward as will be given to any in the church of God. If there are degrees of glory, lose none of that grace, that light, or love, or peace, that is to prepare ye for the higher elevation in glory. "Hold fast that which thou hast," in faith, and hope, and a good conscience, "that no man take thy crown," that thou neither lose it nor any jewel out of it, Rev. iii. 11. The way to attain the full reward is to abide true to Christ and constant in religion to the end.

Thirdly. The reason of the apostle's counsel, and of their care and caution about themselves, which is twofold: 1. The danger and evil of departure from gospel light and revelation. It is in effect and reality a departure from God himself; "Whosoever transgresseth," transgresseth at this dismal rate, "and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God." It is the doctrine of Christ that is appointed to guide us to God; it is that whereby God draws souls to salvation and to himself. They that revolt from thence, in so doing revolt from God. 2. The advantage and happiness of firm adherence to Christian truth. It unites us to Christ, the object or subject-matter of that truth, and thereby to the Father also, for they are one. "He that abideth," rooted and grounded, "in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son." By the doctrine of Christ we are enlightened in the knowledge of the Father and the Son; by it we are sanctified for the Father and the Son, and thereupon are enriched with holy love to the Father and the Son, and thereby prepared for the endless enjoyment of the Father and the Son; "Now ye are clean, through the word which I have spoken to you," Jno. xv. 3. That purity makes meet for heaven. The great God, as he has set his seal to, so he puts a value upon, the doctrine of Christ. We must retain that holy doctrine in faith and love, as we hope or desire to arrive at blessed communion with the Father and the Son.

10 If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed: 11 For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds.

Upon due warning given concerning seducers, the apostle gives direction concerning the treatment of such: They are not to be entertained as the ministers of Christ. The Lord Christ will distinguish them from such, and so would he have his disciples. The direction is negative.

First. Support them not; "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine," concerning Christ as the Son of God, the Messiah, and Anointed of God, for our redemption and salvation, "receive him not into your house." Possibly this lady was like Gaius, whom we read of in the next epistle, a generous housekeeper and hospitable entertainer of travelling ministers and Christians. These deceivers might, possibly, expect the same reception with others, or with the best that came there, as the blind are often bold enough. But the apostle allows it not; do not welcome them into your family. Doubtless such may be relieved in their pressing necessities, but not encouraged for of Common Prayer. "Elect lady:" understood by some to be a person named Electa; by others a person named Kyria (Kyria being the Greek word translated "lady"). Others suppose some particular church to be personified, others the Church Universal. The epistle is evidently addressed to a person at the head of a family, and in some influential position. She was probably a resident in one of the cities of Asia Minor, a visit to which St. John was contemplating from Ephesus.

1, 2. "In the truth . . . for the truth's sake." "Gospel truth is the ground and bond of Christian union. Love of the truth leads to mutual love."

3. "Grace . . . mercy . . . peace." Trench, in his "New Testament Synonyms," says, "Grace has reference to the sins of men, mercy to their misery. God's grace is extended to men as they are guilty; his mercy is extended to them as they are miserable." Peace is the result of the possession of God's grace and mercy.

ill service. But deniers of the faith are destroyers of souls; and it is supposed that even ladies themselves should have good understanding in the affairs of religion.

Secondly. Bless not their enterprises; "Neither bid them God speed." Attend not their service with your prayers and good wishes. Ill work should not be consecrated or recommended to the Divine benediction. God will be no patron of falsehood, seduction, and sin. We ought to bid God speed to evangelical ministration; but the propagation of fatal error, if we cannot prevent, we must not dare to countenance. Then,

Thirdly. Here is the reason of such direction, forbidding the support and patronage of the deceiver; "For he that biddeth him God speed, is partaker of his evil deeds." Favour and affection partake of the sin. We may be sharers in the iniquities of others. How judicious and how cautious should the Christian be! There are many ways of sharing the guilt of other folks' transgressions; it may be done by culpable silence, indolence, unconcernedness, private contribution, public countenance and assistance, inward approbation, open apology and defence. The Lord pardon our guilt of other persons' sins!

12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink: but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full. 13 The children of thy elect sister greet thee. Amen.

The apostle concludes his letter.

First. With an adjournment of many things to personal conference: "Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink; but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full:" where it is supposed that some things are better spoken than written. A pen and ink may be a mercy and a pleasure; but a personal interview may be more so. The apostle was not yet too old for travel, nor, consequently, for travelling service. The communion of saints should be, by all methods, maintained; their communion should tend to their mutual joy. Excellent ministers may have their joy advanced by their Christian friends; "That I may be comforted together with you, by the mutual faith both of you and me," Rom. i. 12.

Secondly. With the presentation of service and salutation from some near relations to the lady: "The children of thy elect sister greet thee." Grace was abundant towards this family. Here are two elect sisters, and probably their elect children. How will they admire this grace in heaven! The apostle condescends to insert the nieces' duty, as we should call it, or dutiful salutation to their aunt. The duty of inferior relations is to be cherished. Doubtless the apostle was easy of access, and would admit all friendly and pious communication, and was ready to enhance the good lady's joy in her nieces as well as her children. May there be many such gracious ladies rejoicing in their gracious descendants and other relations! Amen.

[In view of the exposition of this epistle we may make the following remarks:—1. It is desirable for a family to have a character for piety so consistent and well understood that all who know it shall perceive it and love it, ver. 1. In the case of this lady and her household, it would seem that, as far as they were known, they were known as a well-ordered Christian household. Such a family John said he loved; and he said that it was loved by all who had any knowledge of them. What is more lovely to the view than such a household? What is better fitted to make an impression on the world favourable to religion? 2. It is a matter of great rejoicing when any part of a family become truly religious, ver. 4. We should rejoice with our friends, and should render unfeigned thanks to God, if any of their children are converted, and walk in the truth. No greater blessing can descend on a family than the early conversion of children; and as angels rejoice over one sinner that is converted, we should rejoice when the children of our friends are brought to a knowledge of the truth, and devote themselves to God in early life. 3. It is our duty to be on our guard against the arts of the teachers of error, ver. 7. They abound in every age. They are often learned, eloquent, and profound. They study and understand the arts of persuasion. They adapt their instructions to the capacity of those whom they would lead astray. They flatter their vanity; accommodate themselves to their peculiar views and tastes; court their society, and seek to share their friendship. They often appear to be eminently meek, and serious, and devout, and prayerful, for they know that no others can succeed who profess to inculcate the principles of religion. There are few arts more profound than that of leading men into error; few that are studied more, or with greater success. Every Christian, therefore, should be on his guard against such arts; and while he should on all subjects be open to conviction, and be ready to yield his own opinions when convinced that they are wrong, yet he should yield to truth, not to men; to argument, not to the influence of the personal character of the professed religious teacher. 4. We may see that it is possible for us to lose a portion of the reward which we might enjoy in heaven, ver. 8. The rewards of heaven will be apportioned to our character, and to our services in the cause of religion in this life, and they who "sow sparingly shall reap also sparingly." Christians often begin their course with great zeal, and as if they were determined to reap the highest rewards of the heavenly world. If they should persevere in the course which they have commenced, they would indeed shine as the stars in the firmament. But, alas! their zeal soon dies away. They relax their efforts, and lose their watchfulness. They engage in some pursuit that absorbs their time, and interferes with their habits of devotion. They connive at error and sin; begin to love the comforts of this life; seek the honours or the riches of this world; and though they may be saved at last, yet they lose half their reward. It should be a fixed purpose with all Christians, and especially with such as are just entering on the Christian life, to wear in heaven a crown as bright, and studded with as many jewels, as can possibly be obtained. 5. We may learn from this epistle how to regard and treat the teachers of error, ver. 10. We are not to do any thing that can be fairly construed as countenancing their doctrines. This simple rule would guide us to a course that is right. We are to have minds open to conviction. We are to love the truth, and be ever ready to follow it. We are not to be prejudiced against any thing. We are to treat all men with kindness; to be true, and just, and faithful in our intercourse with all: to be hospitable, and ever ready to do good to all who are needy, whatever their name, colour, rank, or opinions. We are not to cut the ties which bind us to our friends and kindred, though they embrace opinions which we deem erroneous or dangerous; but we are in no way to become the patrons of error, or to leave the impression that we are indifferent as to what is believed. The friends of truth and piety we should receive cordially to our dwellings, and should account ourselves honoured by their presence, Ps. ci. 6, 7; strangers we should not forget to entertain, for thereby we may entertain angels unawares, Heb. xiii. 2; but the open advocate of what we regard as dangerous error we are not to receive in any such sense or way as to have our treatment of him fairly construed as patronising his errors, or commending him as a teacher to the favourable regards of our fellow-men. Neither by our influence, our names, our money, our personal friendship, are we to give him increased facilities for spreading pernicious error through the world. As men, as fellow-sufferers, as citizens, as neighbours, as the friends of temperance, of the prisoner, of the widow, the orphan, and the slave, and as the patrons of learning, we may be united in promoting objects dear to our hearts; but as religious teachers we are to show them no countenance, not so much as would be implied in the common form of salutation wishing them success. In all this there is no breach of charity, and no want of true love, for we are to love the truth more than we are the persons of men. To the man himself we should be ever ready to do good. Him we should never injure in any way, in his person, property, or feelings. We should never attempt to deprive him of the right of cherishing his own opinions, and of spreading them in his own way, answerable, not to us, but to God. We should impose no pains or penalties on him for the opinions which he holds. But we should do nothing to give him increased power to propagate them, and should never place ourselves, by any alliance of friendship, family, or business, in such a position that we shall not be perfectly free to maintain our own sentiments, and to oppose what we deem to be error, whoever may advocate it.]

[There is a love founded on a common apprehension of the truth between mind and mind, and a mutual acknowledgment of that truth in each other; but in counterpoint to this there is an alienation of affection that takes place, when there arises the suspicion or imagination of an error, and, more particularly, when it amounts to the conception of a heresy. I believe that at this moment I labour under a suspicion of this sort; and I feel a consequent distrust and perhaps even dislike of me as the effect of it.—My God, give me to walk aright under this visitation—to walk in the truth even when accused for delinquency or of hostility to the truth. Guide my thoughts aright, and along with these my feelings and my conduct aright. Let all things be done with charity, even while I quit myself like a man. Give me, O Lord, to experience in mind and heart the precious conjunction of truth and love. Give me the unction that is from the Holy One—the anointing which remaineth; and then not only shall the truth dwell in us and be with us for ever, but we shall be grounded and settled in love—that first and foremost of the Spirit's fruits. But let me not forget that God's commandment is not barely that we should walk aright, but, in order to this, that we should walk in truth. The commandment includes both the truth and the walk. Give me, O Lord, the love of the truth that I might be saved. How intimately love and truth are blended together in this epistle!—we are commanded to walk in truth—we are beseeched to love; and this love is said to lie in our walking after the commandments. And all is here urged on the ground that error is abroad—error so deadly as to involve in it the denial of Christ, even amounting to its being an antichrist. To deny that Christ came in the flesh is to deny the literal sacrifice made by him for the sins of the world—analogueous to the denial spoken of by Peter, regarding those who denied the Lord that bought them, 2 Pet. ii. 1. This is a damnable heresy; and let us mark the reiterated testimony which the apostle gives as to the importance of right doctrine—nay, the sanction which he confers—if not on our hostility to, at least on our alienation from, all those who bring not the right doctrine along with them. With such there should be a suspension of all intercourse, at least of all hospitality. Give me, O Lord, to conduct myself aright amid these various elements and various considerations. Let me not undervalue doctrine, and not only seek earnestly, but contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints—else I may lose the things which I have wrought, and fall short of a full reward.—Chalmers's Posthumous Works.]

4. "Walking in truth." Not merely honestly and truthfully, but in that truth of God which has been manifested in Christ, who is "the Truth." This "walking in the truth," the apostle goes on to say, was according to the commandment received from the Father, who had so bidden them to walk. Alford observes that the apostle had apparently, in some place where he was, lit upon these children of the elect lady, and sends her their good report. "They were probably on a visit to their cousins (say Webster and Wilkinson), who lived at Ephesus, or in its neighbourhood." It is an ingenious remark made by Bengel, that the children here spoken of are at least four in number, as more than one were with her (verse 1), and more than one were absent.

5. "And now:" these words serve to introduce the subject of the letter, which is Christian love—its due exhibition, its proper objects, its limitations.

6. "This is the commandment:" rather, "the commandment is this"—viz., love, in which all God's other commandments are summed up, for "love is the fulfilling of the law." It is the union between love and truth, especially the truth set forth with living force in the Incarnation; this causes the apostle to add the warning in the next verse. "That ye should walk in it:" i.e., in love. Love and obedience, it is well remarked, are convertible terms (John xiv. 15, 21). This is love, that we obey his commandments; this is his (great) commandment, to walk in love.

8. "That we lose not . . . that we receive," &c.: the oldest MSS. and versions read, "that ye lose not, but that ye receive, which we have wrought." "Look that ye lose not the believing state of truth and love, which we, as God's workmen, were the instruments of working in you."

9. "Whosoever transgresseth," &c., may be rendered, "transgresseth by not abiding." After the word "transgresseth" we may supply, from verses 4–6, "the commandment;" or we may compare Acts i. 25, "by transgression fell," and render "he who apostatises and abideth not," or "by abiding not."

10. The reference is evidently not to a mere traveller seeking hospitality, but to one in the character and engaged in the work of a teacher, whose teaching is opposed to the truth. "It must be remembered that persons who were to be thus treated were evidently those who came to a church claiming recognition as ministers in communion with it, and designing to make use of their reception as a means of corrupting it by heretical teaching, and procuring favourable introductions elsewhere" (Webster and Wilkinson).

12. "Paper:" made of the films or inner skins of the stem of the Egyptian reed papyrus, or biblos. "Ink:" atramentum, made of soot or charcoal, more like paint or rich oil than our ink.

13. "Elect sister." The reference will depend on the meaning given to the word "lady" at the commencement of the epistle, whether it be understood of a person or a church.

EXPOSITION OF THE THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CHRISTIAN communion is exerted and cherished by letter. Christians are to be commended in the practical proof of their professed subjection, to the gospel of Christ. The animating and countenancing of generous and public-spirited persons is doing good to many. To this end the apostle sends this encouraging epistle to his friend Gaius; in which, also, he complains of the quite opposite spirit and practice of a certain minister, and confirms the good report concerning another, more worthy to be imitated.

In this epistle the apostle congratulates Gaius upon the prosperity of his soul, ver. 1, 2; upon the fame he had among good Christians, ver. 3, 4; upon his charity and hospitality to the servants of Christ, ver. 5, 6; he complains of contemptuous treatment by an ambitious Diotrephes, ver. 9, 10; recommends Demetrius, ver. 12; and hopes to visit Gaius shortly, ver. 13, 14.

HE elder unto the wellbeloved Gaius, whom I love in the truth. 2 Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

Here we see, First. The sacred penman that writes and sends the letter. Not here, indeed, notified by his name, but a more general character, "the elder." He that is so by years and by office. Honour and deference is due to both. Some have questioned whether this were John the apostle, or no; but his style and spirit seem to shine therein. They that are beloved of Christ will love the brethren for his sake. Gaius could not question from whom the letter came. The apostle might have assumed many more illustrious characters, but it becomes not Christ's ministers to affect swelling, pompous titles. He almost levels himself with the more ordinary pastors of the church, while he styles himself "the elder." Or, possibly, most of the extraordinary ministers, the apostles, were now dead, and this holy survivor would countenance the continued standing ministry, by assuming the more common title, "the elder." "The elders I exhort, who am also an elder," 1 Pet. v. 1.

Secondly. The person saluted and honoured by the letter. The former was directed to an elect lady, this to a choice gentleman. Such are worthy of esteem and value. He is notified, 1. By his name, Gaius. We read of several of that name, particularly of one whom the apostle Paul baptized at Corinth, who, possibly, might be also the apostles host and kind entertainer there, Rom. xvi. 23. If this be not he, it is his brother in name, estate, and disposition. Then, 2. By the kind expressions of the apostle to him: "The well beloved," and "whom I love in the truth." Love expressed is wont to kindle love. Here seems to be either the sincerity of the apostle's love, or the religion of it, and then there is both. The sincerity of it; "Whom I love in truth." Whom I truly, cordially love. The religion of it; "Whom I love in the truth," that is, for the truth's sake: as abiding and walking in the truth as it is in Jesus. To love our friends for the truth's sake is true love, religious, gospel love.

Thirdly. The salutation or greeting, containing a prayer introduced by an affectionate compellation; "Beloved." Thou beloved one in Christ. The minister that would gain love must shew it himself. Here is, 1. The apostle's good opinion of his friend—that his soul prospered. There is such a thing as soul prosperity, the greatest blessing on this side heaven. This supposeth regeneration, and an inward fund of spiritual life. This stock is increasing; and, while spiritual treasures are advancing, the soul is in a fair way to the kingdom of glory. 2. His good wish for his friend, that his body may prosper and be in health, as well as his soul. [Not only as well as his soul, but he prays that in all other respects he might be prospered as much as he was in his soul. It argues a high state of piety when we can, as the expression of our highest desire for the welfare of our friends, express the hope that they may be in all respects as much prospered as they are in their spiritual concerns.] Grace and health are two rich companions. Grace will improve health, health will employ grace. It frequently falls out that a rich soul is lodged in a crazy body. Grace must be exercised in submission to such a dispensation. We may well wish and pray that they that have prosperous souls may have healthful bodies too. Their grave will shine in a larger sphere of activity.

1. "Gaius:" the name was very common; and whether the Gaius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29), or of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14), or of Derbe (Acts xx. 4), or a different person altogether, it is hard to decide. Some have supposed him to have been the same with a bishop of Pergamos who bore this name.

5. "To the brethren and to strangers:" rather, "towards the brethren, and that (and those brethren) strangers." These strangers from verse 7 appear to have been evangelists; and on their return

3 For I rejoiced greatly, when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth. 4 I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in truth. 5 Beloved, thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers; 6 Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church: whom if thou bring forward on their journey after a godly sort, thou shalt do well: 7 Because that for his name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles. 8 We therefore ought to receive such, that we might be fellowhelpers to the truth.

In these verses we have,

First. The good report that the apostle had received concerning this friend of his; "The brethren came, and testified of the truth that is in thee," ver. 3; "Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church," ver. 6. Where we may see, 1. The testimony or thing testified concerning Gaius; "The truth that was in him;" the reality of his faith, the sincerity of his religion and devotedness to God; and this evinced by his charity, which includes his love to the brethren, kindness to the poor, hospitality to Christian strangers, and readiness to accommodate them for the service of the Gospel. Faith should work by love. It gives a lustre in and by the offices of love, and induces others to commend its integrity. 2. The witnesses; brethren that came from Gaius testified and bore witness. A good report is due from those that have received good. Though a good name is but a small reward for costly service, yet it is better than precious ointment, and will not be refused by the ingenious and religious. 3. The auditory or judicatory before which the report and testimony were given; "Before the church." This seems to be the church at which the apostle now resided. What church that was we are not sure. What occasion they had thus to testify his faith and love before the church we cannot tell; possibly out of the fulness of the heart the mouth spake; they could not but testify what they found and felt. Possibly they would engage the church's prayer for the continued life and usefulness of such a patron,—that he might prosper and be in health as his soul prospered.

Secondly. The report the apostle himself gives of him, introduced by an endearing appellation again; "Beloved, thou dost faithfully whatsoever thou dost to the brethren, and to strangers," ver. 5. 1. He was hospitable; good to the brethren, even to strangers. It was enough to recommend them to Gaius's house that they belonged to Christ, or he was good to the brethren of the same church with himself, and to those that came from far. All of the household of faith were welcome to him. 2. He seems to be of a catholic spirit. He could overlook the petty differences among serious Christians, and be communicative to all that bore the image and did the work of Christ. And, 3. He was conscientious in what he did; "Thou dost faithfully," thou makest faithful work of, "whatsoever thou dost." Thou dost it as a faithful servant; and from the Lord Christ mayest thou expect the reward of the inheritance. Such faithful souls can hear their own praises without being puffed up. The commendation of what is good in us is designed, not for our pride, but for our encouragement to continue therein, and should be accordingly improved.

Thirdly. The apostle's joy therein, in the good report itself, and the good ground of it; "I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and testified," &c., ver. 3. "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth," that is, in the precepts of the Christian religion. [That they adhere steadfastly to the truth, and that they live in accordance with it.] The best evidence of would report to the church not only their missionary success, but the kindness they had experienced at the hands of Gaius.

7. "His name's sake:" i.e., on behalf of the name of Christ. "Taking nothing;" the words imply that it was the deliberate purpose and continued habit of these men to receive no pay from the Gentiles.

8. "Receive:" the oldest MSS. read "take up." As they take nothing from the Gentiles, we ought to take them up so as to our having the truth is our walking in the truth. Good men will greatly rejoice in the soul prosperity of others, and they are glad to hear of the grace and goodness of others: "And they glorified God in me." Love envieth not, but rejoiceth in the good name of other folks. As it is joy to good parents, it will be joy to good ministers, to see their children evidence their truth in religion, and adorn their profession.

Fourthly. The direction the apostle gives his friend concerning farther treatment of the brethren that were with him; "Whom, if thou bring forward on their journey, after a godly sort, thou shalt do well." It was customary, in those days of love, to attend travelling ministers and Christians at least some part of their road, 1 Cor. xvi. 6. It is a kindness to a stranger to be guided in his way—a pleasure to travellers to meet with suitable company. This is a work that may be done "after a godly sort," in a manner worthy of God, that is, suitable to the deference and relation we bear to God. Christians should consider not only what they must do, but what they may do; what they may most honourably and laudably do. The liberal mind deviseth liberal, generous things. Then Christians should do even the common actions of life and of goodwill after a godly sort, as serving God therein, and designing his glory. Then.

Fifthly. The reasons of this directed conduct. These are two: 1. "Because that for his name's sake 'these brethren' went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles." It appears thus that these were ministerial brethren, that they went forth to preach the Gospel and propagate Christianity. Possibly they might be sent out by this apostle himself. They went forth to convert the Gentiles. This was excellent service. They went forth for God and his name's sake. This is the minister's highest end, and should be his principal spring and motive, to gather and to build up a people for his name. They went forth also to carry a free Gospel about with them—to make it unchangeable where they came—taking nothing of the Gentiles." These were worthy of double honour. There are those that are not called to preach the Gospel themselves, that yet may much contribute to the progress of it. The Gospel should be made without charge to those to whom it is first preached. They that know it not cannot be expected to value it. The churches and Christian patriots ought to concur to support the propagation of holy religion in the pagan countries. Public spirits should concur according to their several capacities. They that are freely communicative of Christ's Gospel should be assisted by those that are communicative of their purses. 2. "We ought therefore to receive such, that we may be fellow-helpers to the truth," that is, to true religion. The institution of Christ is the true religion. It has been attested by God. They that are true in it and true to it will earnestly desire and pray for, and contribute to, its propagation in the world. Many ways may the truth be befriended and assisted. They that cannot themselves proclaim it, may yet receive, accompany, help, and countenance those that do.

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the preeminence among them, receiveth us not. 10 Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth, prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church. 11 Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

First. Here is a very different example and character. An officer, a minister in the church less generous, catholic, and communicative than the private Christians. Ministers may sometimes be outshone, outdone. In reference to this minister, we see, 1. His name: a Gentile name, Diotrephes, attended with an unchristian spirit. 2. His temper and spirit: full of pride and ambition. He loves to have the pre-eminence. This ferment sprung and wrought betimes. It is an ill, unbecoming character of Christ's minister to love pre-eminence, to affect presidency and pre-eminence in the church of God. [The single word rendered "who loveth to have the pre-eminence" (φιλονεικεῖν), occurs nowhere in the New Testament. It means simply, who loves to be first—meaning that he loved to be at the head of all things, to rule, to lord it over others. It is clearly supposed here that the church would have complied with the request of the writer if it had not been for this man.] 3. His contempt of the apostle's authority, and letter, and friends. Of his authority: the deeds which he doeth, contrary to our appointment; "Prating against us with malicious words." Strange that the contempt should run so high; but ambition will breed malice against those that oppose it. Malice and ill-will in the heart will be apt to vent itself by the lips. The heart and mouth are both to be watched. Of his letter: "I wrote to the church," ver. 9, namely, in recommendation of such and such brethren. "But Diotrephes receiveth us not;" admits not our letter and testimony therein. This seems to be the church of which Gaius was a member. A gospel church seems to be such a society as to which a letter may be written and communicated. Gospel churches may well expect and be allowed credentials with the strangers that desire to be admitted among them. The apostle seems to write by and with these brethren. To an ambitious, aspiring spirit, apostolical authority or epistle signifies but little. Of his friends, the brethren he recommended; "Neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church," ver. 10. There might be some differences or different customs between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians. Pastors should seriously consider what differences are tolerable. The pastor is not at absolute liberty, nor lord over God's heritage. It is bad to do no good ourselves, but it is worse to hinder those that would. Church power and church censures are often abused. Many are cast out of the church that should be received there with satisfaction and welcome. But woe to those that cast out the brethren whom the Lord Christ will take into his own communion and kingdom. 4. The apostle's menace of this proud domineer: "Wherefore, if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doeth," ver. 10; will remember to censure them. This seems to intimate apostolical authority. But the apostle seems not to hold an episcopal court, to which Diotrephes must be summoned, but will come to take cognizance of this affair in the church to which it belongs. Acts of ecclesiastical domination and tyranny ought to be aimed at and upon. May it be better agreed to whom that power belongs!

Secondly. Here is counsel upon that different character; dissuasion from copying such a pattern, and indeed any evil at all; "Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good," ver. 11. Imitate not such ecclesiastical, unchristian, pernicious evil; but pursue the contrary good in wisdom, purity, peace, and love. Caution and counsel are not needless to those that are good already. Those cautions and counsels are most like to be accepted that are seasoned with love. "Beloved, follow not that which is evil." To this caution and counsel a reason is respectively subjoined. 1. To the counsel: "Follow that which is good;" for "he that doth good," naturally and genuinely doth good, as delighting therein, "is of God," that is, is born of God. The practice of goodness is the evidence of our filial, happy relation to God. 2. To the caution: "Follow not that which is evil." "He that doth evil," with bent of mind pursues it, "hath not seen God," is not duly sensible of his holy nature and will. Evil workers vainly pretend or boast an acquaintance with God.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know that our record is true. 13 I had many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee: 14 But I trust I shall shortly see thee, and we shall speak face to face. Peace be to thee. Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.

Here we see, First. The character of another person, one Demetrius, not much known otherwise; but here his name will live. A name in the Gospel, a fame in the churches, is better than that of sons and daughters. His character was his commendation. His commendation was, 1. General: "Demetrius hath a good report of all men." Few are well spoken of by all. And sometimes it is ill to be so. But universal integrity and goodness is the way to, and sometimes obtains, the universal applause. 2. Deserved and well founded: "And of the truth itself," ver. 12. Some have a good report, but not of the truth itself. Happy they whose spirit and conduct commend them before God and men. 3. Confirmed by the apostle's and his friends' testimony: "Yea, and we also bear record," and that with an appeal to Gaius's own knowledge; "And ye," you and your friends, "know that our record is true." Probably this Demetrius was known to the church where the apostle now resided, and to that where Gaius was. It is good to be well known, or known for good. We must be ready to bear our testimony to those that are good. It is a debt to virtue and goodness. It is well for those that are commended when those that commend them can appeal to the conscience of those that know them most.

Secondly. The conclusion of the epistle. In which we may observe, 1. The referring of some things to personal interview; "I have many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen, but I trust I shall shortly see thee," ver. 13, 14. Many things may be more proper for immediate communication than for letter. A little personal conference may spare the time, trouble, and charge of many letters. And good Christians may well be glad to see one another. 2. The benediction; "Peace be to you;" that is, all felicity attend you. They that are good and happy themselves wish others so too. 3. The public salutation sent to Gaius; "Our friends salute thee." A friend to the propagation of religion deserves a common remembrance. And these pious persons shew their friendship to religion as well as to Gaius. 4. The apostle's particular salutation of the Christians in Gaius's church or vicinity; "Greet the friends by name." I doubt they were not very many that must be so personally saluted. But we must learn humility as well as love. The lowest in the church of Christ should be greeted. And they may well salute and greet one another on earth that hope to live together in heaven. And the apostle that had lain in Christ's bosom lays Christ's friends in his heart.

[From this epistle we may learn, 1. It is proper to desire for our friends all temporal good, to wish their happiness in every respect, ver. 2. It is not common that in their spiritual interests they are so much more prosperous than they are in other respects that we can make the standard of our wishes in regard to them, but it sometimes does occur, as in the case of Gaius. In such cases we may indeed rejoice with a friend, and feel that all will be well with him. But in how few cases, even among professed Christians, can we with propriety make the prosperity of the soul the standard by which to measure the happiness which we desire for them in other respects! Doddridge says, 'What a curse would this bring upon many to wish that they might prosper even as their souls prospered!' Of how much property would they at once be deprived; how embarrassed would be their affairs; how pale, and wan, and sickly would they be, if they should be in all respects as they are in their spiritual interests. 2. It is an unspeakable pleasure to a Christian to learn that his friends are living and acting as becomes sincere Christians; that they love what is true, and abound in the duties of hospitality, charity, and benevolence, ver. 3-6. 3. It is the duty and the privilege of those who love the cause of religion to go and preach the Gospel to those who are destitute, expecting to receive nothing from them, and doing it as a work of pure benevolence, ver. 7. The missionary spirit existed early in the Christian church, and indeed may be regarded as the prevailing spirit in those times. It has always been the prevailing spirit when religion has flourished in the church. And as we in Christian lands owe the blessings which we enjoy to the fact that in former times there were those who were willing thus to go forth, so it will be true that the richest blessings which are to descend on India, and Africa, and the islands of the sea, will be traced in future times to the fact that there are in our age those who are willing to follow the example of the apostles in going forth to do good to a dying world. 4. It is our duty to contribute to the support of those who thus go among the heathen, and to aid them in every way in which we can promote the object which they have in view. So John felt it to be the duty of the church in regard to those who went forth in his time; and so, when the church, under the influence of Diotrephes, had refused to do it, he commended Gaius for performing that duty, ver. 6, 8. 5. For the same reason it is our duty to contribute to the support of missionaries in the destitute places of our own land, ver. 8. They often go among a people who are as destitute and who will as little appreciate the Gospel, and who are as much prejudiced against it, and who are as poor, as the heathen. 6. We may see from this epistle that churches ought to be united in promoting the cause of religion, ver. 8, 9. They should regard it as a common cause, in which one has as much concern as another, and where each should feel it a privilege to co-operate with his brethren. One church, in proportion to its ability, has as much interest in the spread of Christianity as another, and should feel that it has much responsibility in doing it. 7. We may see, from this epistle, the evil of having one troublesome man in the church, ver. 10. Such a man, by his talents, his address, his superior learning, his wealth, or by his arrogance, pride, and self-confidence, may control a church, and effectually hinder its promoting the work of religion. Yet how often has the spirit which actuated Diotrephes prevailed in the church! 8. There may be circumstances where it is proper—where it is a duty—to receive those who have been cast out of the church, ver. 8.]

support them, that we may become fellow-workers with them for the truth.

9. "The church:" i.e., of which Gaius was a member, and over whom Diotrephes desired to rule. "Not receiving:" i.e., not recognising the authority of the apostle.

10. "The brethren:" i.e., the evangelists mentioned above. Diotrephes not only neglected to entertain these evangelists, but forbade those who would receive them, and cast out of the church those who received them. "He was evidently one high in power, and able to forbid and to punish the reception of the travelling brethren."

12. "Of the truth itself:" "The objective truth of God, which is the divine rule of the walk of all believers, gives a good testimony to him who really walks in the truth. This witness lies in the accordance of his walk with the requirement of God's truth" (Alford).

DELIVERING LETTERS.

EXPOSITION

GENERAL EPISTLE OF JUDE,

THIS epistle (as are some few others) is styled general or catholic, for that it is not immediately directed to any particular person, family, or church, but to the whole society of Christians of that time, lately converted to the faith of Christ, whether from Judaism or paganism. And it is and will be of standing, lasting, and special use, in and to the church, as long as Christianity, that is, as time, shall last. [Under that false shew of learning which distinguishes the rationalistic school some have attempted to set aside the Divine authority of this book. The attempts of the more notorious writers of that school are too wicked to deceive those desiring to find the truth, and too absurd long to continue to delude any. The epistle was probably written late in the first century.] This epistle (as most of the rest do) consists of, I. A preface, or introduction, ver. 1, 2. II. The body of the epistle, ver. 3—23, inclusive. III. The conclusion by way of doxology, ver. 24, 25. The general scope of it is much the same with that of the second chapter of the second epistle of Peter, which having been already explained, the less will need to be said on this. It is designed to warn us against seducers and their seduction, to inspire us with a warm love to, and a hearty concern for, truth, (evident and important truth,) and that in the closest conjunction with holiness, of which charity, or sincere, unbiassed, brotherly love, is a most essential character and inseparable branch. [It is full of seasonable and practical instruction, suited to meet many of the evils of their days.] The truth we are to hold fast, and endeavour that others may be acquainted with, and not depart from, hath two special characters. 1. It is "the truth as it is in Jesus," Eph. iv. 21; and, 2. It is "the truth after," or which is according to, "godliness," Tit. i. 1. The Gospel is the Gospel of Christ, he hath revealed it to us, and he is the main subject of it; and therefore we are indispensably bound to learn from thence all we can of his person, natures, and offices. Indifference as to this is inexcusable in any who call themselves Christians, and we know from what fountain we are wholly and solely to draw all necessary saving knowledge. Farther, it is also a doctrine of godliness; whatever doctrines favour the corrupt lusts of men cannot be of God, let the pleas and pretensions for them be what they will. Errors dangerous to the souls of men soon sprang up in the church. The servants slept, and tares were sown; but such was the wisdom and kindness of Providence that they began sensibly to appear and shew themselves while some at least of the apostles were yet alive to confute them, and warn others against them. We are apt to think if we had lived in their times we should have been abundantly fenced against the attempts and artifices of seducers, but we have their testimony and their cautions, which is sufficient; and if we will not believe their writings, neither would we have believed or regarded their sayings, if we had lived amongst them and conversed personally with them. We come now to consider, I. The preface or introduction to this epistle, ver. 1, 2.

Some of the chief things contained in this chapter summarily are, I. An account of the penman of it, a character of the church, the blessings and privileges of that happy society, ver. 1, 2. II. The occasion of writing this epistle, ver. 3. III. A character of evil and perverse men, who were already sprung up in that infant state of the church, and would be succeeded by others of the like evil spirit and temper in after times, ver. 4. IV. A caution against hearkening to and following after such, from the severity of God towards the unbelieving, murmuring Israelites at their coming out of Egypt, the angels that fell, the instance of Sodom and Gomorrah, their sin and punishment, ver. 5—7. V. To these the apostle likens the seducers against whom he was warning them, and describes them at large, from ver. 8—13, inclusive. VI. Then, as specially suitable to his argument, he cites an ancient prophecy of Enoch, foretelling and describing the future judgment, ver. 14, 15. VII. Enlargeth on the seducer's character, guards against the offence which honest minds might be apt to take at the so early permission of such things, by shewing that it was foretold long before, that so it must be, ver. 16—19. VIII. Exhorts them to perseverance in the faith, fervency in prayer, watchfulness against falling from the love of God, and a lively hope of eternal life, ver. 20, 21. IX. Directs them how to carry themselves towards the erroneous and scandalous, ver. 22, 23. And, X. Closeth with an admirable doxology, in the last two verses.

brought before Domitian: Eccles. Hist., lib. iii., ch. xix. xx. This is another testimony against the forbidding to marry of the Roman apostacy. The Divine authority of Jude is clear, from the testimonies of the early fathers—Clement, and Origen, and Tertullian, who says, 'Enoch is quoted by the apostle Jude.' The internal evidences are very strong and conclusive. Its predictions, as already fulfilled, have proved its Divine inspiration, and their future fulfilment will doubtless yet more abundantly do so.]

He was namesake to one of his ancestors, the patriarch son of Jacob, the most eminent, though not the first-born, of his sons, out of whose loins (lineally, in a most direct succession) the Messiah came. This was a name of worth, eminency, and honour, yet, 1. He has a wicked namesake. There was one Judas, one of the twelve, surnamed Iscariot, from the place of his birth, who was a vile traitor, the betrayer of his and our Lord. The same names may be common to the best and worst persons. It may be instructive to be called after the names of eminently good men, but there can be no inference drawn thence what we shall prove, though we may even thence conclude what sort of persons our good parents or progenitors desired and hoped we should be. But, 2. Our Judas was quite another man. He was an apostle, so was Iscariot; but he was a sincere disciple and follower of Christ, so was not the other; he was a faithful servant of Jesus Christ, the other was his betrayer and murderer; therefore here the one is very carefully distinguished from the other. Dr. Manton's note upon this is, that God takes great care of the good name of his sincere and useful servants. Why then should we be prodigal of our own or one another's reputation and usefulness? Our apostle here calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ, esteeming that a most honourable title. It is more honourable to be a sincere and useful servant of Christ than to be an earthly king, how potent and prosperous soever. He might have claimed kindred to Christ, according to the flesh, but he waives that, and rather glories in being his servant. Observe, 1st. It is really a greater honour to be a faithful servant of Jesus Christ than to be akin to him according to the flesh. Many of Christ's natural kindred, as well as of his progenitors, perished; not from want of natural affection in him as man, but from infidelity and obstinacy in themselves, which should make the descendants and near relatives of persons most eminent for sincere and exemplary piety jealous over themselves with a godly jealousy. A son of Noah may be saved in the ark from a flood of temporal destruction, and yet be overwhelmed at last in a deluge of Divine wrath, and suffer the vengeance of eternal fire. Christ himself tells us that he that "heareth his word and doeth it," namely, he only, "is as his brother, and sister, and mother;" that is, more honourably and advantageously related to him than the nearest and dearest of his natural relatives, considered merely as such; see Mat. xii. 48—50. Note farther, 2nd. In that the apostle Jude styles himself a servant, though an apostle, a dignified officer in Christ's kingdom, that it is a great honour to the meanest sincere minister, (and it holds proportionably as to every upright Christian,) that he

UDE, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called: 2 Mercy unto you, and peace, and love, be multiplied.

Here we have,

First. An account of the penman of this epistle, Jude, or Judas, or Judah.

[Jude, the apostle of Christ, is generally believed to be the writer of this epistle. He had also the name of Lebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddæus, Mat. x. 3; Mar. iii. 18; Lu. vi. 16. It is probable that Jude the apostle was the author of the epistle. Dr. Olshausen, however, supposes it was another Jude, the brother of our Lord; but see Lardner, vol. iii., 4to., pp. 437—447, and Greswell's Dissertations. It is probable that Jude was married, and had children, as Eusebius reports that some of the grandchildren of Jude were

* Dr. Watts, in his copy of Matthew Henry's Exposition, states that the Exposition on Jude was prepared by Mr. John Billingsley; and it appears from his statements that he had material help from Matthew Henry's own writings. This revision of it is by the Rev. Edward Bickersteth, rector of Watton, Hertfordshire.

Introductory Note.—The writer of this epistle styles himself "Jude, the brother of James," and has been usually identified with the apostle Judas Lebbaeus or Thaddæus (Luke vi. 16). But this mode of supplying the ellipsis is questionable, and there are strong reasons for rendering the words "Judas, the son of James." See verse 17, where the writer seems to distinguish himself from the apostles, and rests his teaching rather on their authority than his own. The most probable conclusion is that the author was Jude, one of the brethren of Jesus, and brother of James; not the apostle, the son of Alphaeus, but Bishop of Jerusalem, of whose dignity and authority in the Church he avails himself to introduce his epistle to his readers. From the references to the Old Testament history and Jewish traditions, it seems most probable that the epistle was in the first instance addressed to Jewish Christians. The persons blamed were libertines and heretics in doctrine. Insubordination, self-seeking, and licentiousness, the fruit of Antinomian is the servant of Jesus Christ. They were servants before they were apostles, and they were but servants still. Away then with all pretensions in the ministers of Christ to lordly dominion, either over one another or the flocks committed to their charge. Let us ever have that of our dear Redeemer in actual view, "it shall not be so among you," Mat. xx. 25, 26. "And brother of James," to wit, of him whom the ancients style 'the first bishop of Jerusalem,' of whose character and martyrdom Josephus makes mention, and ascribes the horrible destruction of that city and nation to this wicked cruelty, as one of its principal causes: see Josephus, b. xx., ch. iii.; and Euseb. Eccl. Hist. b. ii. ch. xlii. Of this James our Jude was brother; whether in the strictest or a larger, though very usual, acceptance, I determine not. He, however, reckons it an honour to him that he was the brother of such an one. We ought to honour those who are above us in age, gifts, graces, station; not to envy them, yet neither to flatter them, nor be led merely by their example, when we have reason to think they act wrong. Thus the apostle Paul withstood his fellow-apostle Peter to the face, notwithstanding the high esteem he had of him, and the affectionate love he bare to him, when he saw that he was to be blamed, that is, really blameworthy, Gal. ii. 11, and following verses.

Secondly. We are informed to whom this epistle is directed; namely, to all them who are "sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called." I begin with the last, called; that is, called Christians, namely, in the judgment of charity, farther than which we cannot, nor in justice ought, to go in the judgments or opinions we form or receive of one another; for what appears not, is not, nor ought to come into account in our dealings with, and censures of, one another, whatever abatements the Divine goodness may see fit to make for an honest though misguided zeal. The church pretends not (I am sure it ought not) to judge of secret or hidden things, or drawn into the light before the time, lest our rash and preposterous zeal do more harm than ever it has done, or I am afraid ever will do, good. "The tares and wheat" (if Christ may be Judge) "must grow together till the harvest," Mat. xiii. 28-30. And then he himself will by proper instruments take timely care to separate them. We ought to think the best we can of every man till the contrary appear; not be forward to receive or propagate, much less invent, disadvantageous characters of our brethren. This is the least we can make of the apostle's large and excellent description of charity, 1 Cor. xiii., and this we ought to make conscience of acting up to, which, till we do, the Christian churches will (as, alas! they are at this day) be filled with "envying and strife, confusion and every evil work," Jas. iii. 16. Or, called to be Christians by the preaching of the word, which they gladly receive, and profess cordially to believe, and so are received into the society and fellowship of the church; namely, Christ the Head, and believers the members; real believers really, professed believers visibly. Note, Christians are the called, called out of the world, the evil spirit and temper of it; above the world, to higher and better things, heaven, &c., things unseen and eternal; called from sin to Christ, from vanity to seriousness, from uncleanness to holiness; and this in pursuance of Divine purpose and grace; "for whom he did predestinate, them he also called," Rom. viii. 30. Now they who are thus called are,

1. Sanctified; "Sanctified by God the Father." Sanctification is usually spoken of in Scripture as the work of the Holy Spirit, yet here it is ascribed to God the Father, because the Spirit works it as the Spirit of the Father and the Son. Note, All who are effectually called are sanctified; "Made partakers of a Divine nature," 2 Pet. i. 4; "For without holiness no man shall see the Lord," Heb. xii. 14. Observe, Our sanctification is not our own work. If any are sanctified, they are so by God the Father, not excluding Son or Spirit, for they are one, that is, one God. Our corruption and pollution are of ourselves; but our sanctification and renovation are of God and his grace; and therefore if we perish in our iniquity we must bear the blame; but if we be sanctified and glorified, all the honour and glory must be ascribed to God, and to him alone. I own it is hard to give a clear and distinct account of this, but we must not deny or disregard necessary truth because we cannot fully reconcile the several parts of it to each other; for, on that supposition, we might deny that any one of us could stir an inch from the place we are at present in, though we see the contrary every day and hour.

2. The called and sanctified are preserved in Christ Jesus. As it is God who begins the work of grace in the souls of men, so it is he who carries it on, and perfects it. Where he begins he will perfect; though we are fickle, he is constant; "He will not forsake the work of his own hands," Ps. cxxxviii. 8. Let us not therefore trust in ourselves, nor in our stock of grace already received, but in him, and in him alone; still endeavouring by all proper and appointed means to keep ourselves as ever we would hope he should keep us. "Preserved" from the gates of hell, and to the glory of heaven: "Preserved in Christ Jesus." Observe, All who are preserved are preserved in Jesus Christ; in him as their citadel and stronghold, no longer than they abide in him, and solely by virtue of their union with him. [We have a beautiful summary description of true Christians: sanctified in being set apart by God the Father, as a gift to his Son; preserved in Christ Jesus, secured in his keeping, so that none can pluck them thence; and called effectually, by the Holy Ghost, to this holy and happy state. The Lord make every reader one of this happy company.]

Thirdly. The apostolical benediction; "Mercy to you," &c. From the mercy, peace, and love of God all our comfort flows, all our real enjoyment in this life, all our hope of a better. 1st. The mercy of God is the spring and fountain of all the good we have or hope for; mercy not only to the miserable but the guilty. 2nd. Next to mercy is peace, which we have from the sense of having obtained mercy. We can have no true and lasting peace but what flows from our reconciliation with God by Jesus Christ. 3rd. As from mercy springs peace, so from peace springs love; his love to us, our love to him, and our brotherly love (forgotten, wretchedly neglected grace!) to one another. These the apostle prayeth may be multiplied, that Christians may not be content with scraps and narrow scantlings of them; but that souls and societies may be top, brim, swimming full of them. Note, God is ready to supply us with all grace, and a fulness in each grace. We are not straitened (if we are straitened) in him, but in ourselves. [The more grace we have, the more we may hope for. There is no end of the Divine bounty.]

3 Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.

We have here the design of the apostle in writing this epistle to the lately converted Jews and Gentiles, namely, to establish them in the Christian faith, and a practice and conversation truly consonant and conformable thereunto, teachings, are the evils against which Jude warns his readers, and urges them to build themselves in their most holy faith, and to pray in the Holy Ghost, as the only effectual safeguards. Where the Jewish Christians lived is uncertain, nothing definite being said in the epistle. "They evidently," says Alford, "dwelt among a wicked population, probably of a commercial character. Hence some have thought of Corinth as their abode; some of Egypt, to which land it is said the physical phenomena are suitable (see verse 12); some of and in an open and bold profession thereof; especially in times of notorious opposition, whether by artful seduction or violent and inhuman persecution. But then we must see to it very carefully that it be really the Christian faith that we believe, profess, propagate, and contend for; not the discriminating badges of this or the other party; not any thing of later date than the inspired writings of the holy evangelists and apostles. Here observe,

First. That the gospel salvation is a "common salvation;" that is, in a most sincere offer and tender of it to all of mankind whom the notice of it reacheth. For so the commission runs, Mat. xvi. 15, 16, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature," &c. Sure God means as he speaks, (he doth not delude us with vain words, whatever men do,) and therefore none are excluded from the benefit of these gracious offers and invitations but they who obstinately, impudently, finally, exclude themselves; "Whoever will may come and drink of the water of life freely," Rev. xii. 17. [It is common as it is free to all—common as the air we breathe, the sun that shines over the earth, and the rain that descends from heaven, revealing one Father, one Redeemer, one Sanctifier for all.] The application of it is made to all believers, and only to such; it is made to the weak as well as to the strong; let none discourage themselves on the account of hidden decrees which they can know little of, and with which they have nothing to do. God's decrees are dark, his covenants are plain. All good Christians meet in Christ the common Head, are actuated by one and the same Spirit, are guided by one rule, meet here at one throne of grace, and hope shortly to meet in one common inheritance, a glorious one to be sure, but what or how glorious we cannot, nor at present need to, know; but such it will be as vastly to exceed all our present hopes and expectations.

Secondly. This common salvation is the subject matter of the faith of all the saints. The doctrine of it is what they all most heartily consent to; they esteem it as "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance," 1 Tim. i. 15; it is the faith once, or at once, once for all, delivered to the saints; to which nothing can be added, from which nothing may be detracted, in which nothing more nor less should be altered. Here let us abide: here we are safe; if we stir a step farther we are in danger of being either entangled or seduced.

Thirdly. The apostles and evangelists all wrote to us of this common salvation. This cannot be doubted by those who have carefully read their writings. It is hard any should think they wrote chiefly to maintain particular schemes and opinions, especially such as they never did nor could think of. It is enough that they have fully declared to us, by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, all that is necessary for every one to believe and do, in order to obtain a personal interest in the common salvation.

Fourthly. They who preach or write of the common salvation should give all diligence to do it well. Not allow themselves to offer to God, or his people, that which cost them nothing, or next to nothing, little or no pains or thought, 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. This were to treat God irreverently and man unjustly. The apostle, though inspired, "gave all diligence to write of the common salvation;" what then will become of those who, though uninspired, give no diligence, or next to none, but say to the people, even in the name of God, quicquid in buccam venerit, "what comes next;" so they use Scripture words—care not how they interpret or apply them. They who speak of sacred things ought always to speak of them with the greatest reverence, care, and diligence.

Fifthly. They who have received the doctrine of this common salvation must contend earnestly for it: "Earnestly," not furiously. They who strive for the Christian faith, or in the Christian course, must strive lawfully, or they lose their labour, and run great hazard of losing their crown, 2 Tim. ii. 5. "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," Isa. i. 20. Lying for the truth is bad, and scolding for it is not much better. Observe, They who have received the truth must contend for it. But how? As the apostles did; by suffering patiently and courageously for it, not by making others suffer if they will not presently embrace every notion that we are pleased (proved or unproved) to call faith or fundamental. We must not suffer ourselves to be robbed of any essential article of Christian faith by the cunning craftiness, or specious plausible pretences, of any who "lie in wait to deceive," Eph. iv. 14. The apostle Paul tells us he preached the Gospel, mind it was the Gospel, "with much contention," 1 Thes. ii. 2; that is, (as I understand it,) with great earnestness, with a hearty zeal, and a great concern for the success of what he preached. But if we will understand contention in the common acceptance of the word, we must impartially consider with whom the apostle contended, and how, the enlarging on which would not be proper for this place. [Earnest contention for the faith amid abounding errors may be a prior duty to that of enlarging on the common salvation. Christians are to maintain the Gospel against its enemies.]

We have here the occasion the apostle had to write to this purpose. As evil manners give rise to good laws, so dangerous errors often give just occasion to the proper defence of important truth.

4 For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

Here observe, First. That ungodly men are the great enemies of the faith of Christ and the peace of the church. They who deny or corrupt the one, and disturb the other, are here expressly styled ungodly men. We might have truth with peace, a most desirable thing, were there none, ministers or private Christians, in our particular churches and congregations but truly godly men; a blessing scarcely to be looked or hoped for on this side heaven. Ungodly men raise scruples, start questions, cause divisions, widen breaches, merely to advance and promote their own selfish, ambitious, and covetous ends. This has been the plague of the church in all past ages, and I am afraid no age is, or will be, wholly free from such men and such practices as long as time shall last. The late excellent Mr. Henry's pious and charitable note on this passage, and I wish it were duly laid to heart by all of us who yet survive, is, that nothing cuts us off from the church but that which cuts us off from Christ, namely, reigning infidelity and ungodliness. We must (as he goes on excellently) abhor the thought of branding particular parties (I add, or persons) with this character; especially the doing it without the least proof, or (as it too often happens) the least shadow of it. Those are ungodly men who live without God in the world, who have no regard to God and conscience. They (as the good man goes on) are to be dreaded, and consequently to be avoided, not only who are wicked by sins of commission, but also who are ungodly by sins of omission; who, for example, restrain prayer before God, who dare not reprove a rich man, when it is the duty of their place so to do, for fear they lose his favour, and the advantage they promise themselves therefrom, who "do the work of the Lord negligently," &c.

2. That they are the worst of ungodly men who turn "the grace of God into a commercial city in Syria, seeing that Palestine, where St. Jude dwelt, must at the time of writing the epistle have been in a state of commotion, to which there is no allusion in it."

1. "Sanctified;" read, "beloved in God the Father." (Compare verse 21.) Read also, "kept for Jesus Christ"—i.e., "to be his at the day of his coming."

2. "Mercy;" associated with grace and peace in 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2; Titus i. 4; 2 John 3. (Compare verse 21.) "Be multilasciviousness;" that is, who take encouragement to sin more boldly, because the grace of God hath abounded, and doth still abound so wonderfully; who are hardened in their impieties by the extent and fulness of gospel grace, the design of which is to reduce men from sin, and bring them unto God. Thus therefore to wax wanton under so great grace, and turn it into an occasion of working all uncleanness with greediness, and hardening ourselves in such a course by that very grace, which is the last and most forcible means to reclaim us from it, is to render ourselves the vilest, the worst, and most hopeless of sinners.

Thirdly. They who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness do in effect deny the Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, as Mr. Henry well expresseth it, they deny both natural and revealed religion. They (as he justly goes on) strike at the foundations of natural religion, for they deny the only Lord God; and they overturn all the frame of revealed religion, for they deny the Lord Jesus Christ. Now his great design in establishing his (that is, revealed) religion in the world was to bring us unto God. Note, They who deny our Lord Jesus Christ do, in effect, deny the only Lord God. To deny revealed religion is virtually to overturn natural religion, for they stand or fall together, and they mutually yield light and force to each other. Would to God our modern deists, who live in the midst of gospel light, would seriously consider this, and cautiously, diligently, and impartially examine what it is that hinders their receiving the Gospel, while they profess themselves fully persuaded of all the principles and duties of natural religion. Never two tallies answered more exactly to each other than these do, so that it seems absurd to receive the one and reject the other. One would think it were the fairer way to receive both or reject both; though perhaps the more plausible method, especially in this age, is to act the part they do. [Enoch, as the apostle afterwards notices, and the apostle Peter in his second epistle, and St. Paul, in his epistles to the Thessalonians and to Timothy, as well as other sacred writers, both in the Old and New Testament, wrote before (προγεγραμμενοι) of this corruption of the Gospel. The insidious approach of error creeping in unawares is truly despicable of the rise and course of popery and infidelity; but, though unawares to man, God had foreseen and foretold them from the beginning.]

Fourthly. They who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness are ordained unto condemnation; so Mr. Henry, and no doubt it is a great truth. They (as he speaks) sin against the last, the greatest, and most perfect remedy, and so are without excuse. They who thus sin must needs die of their wounds, of their disease; are of old ordained to this condemnation, whatever that expression means. But what if our translators had thought fit to have rendered the word in the original, which I shall not trouble the English reader with, 'of old fore-written of,' as persons who would, through their own sin and folly, become the proper subjects of this condemnation, where had the harm been? Plain Christians had not been troubled with dark, doubtful, and perplexing thoughts about reprobation, which the strongest heads cannot enter far into, can indeed bear but little of, without much loss and damage. Is it not enough that early notice was given by inspired writers that such seducers and wicked men should arise in later times, and that every one being forewarned of, should be forearmed against them?

["Denying the only Lord," &c. Not outwardly, or there would be no mystery in the iniquity, no deceptableness in the unrighteousness. "Popery deny the Father! Oh, no; she has such reverence for the greatness of the Father she thinks him too great to be approached without human mediators. Popery deny the Son! Why, she has crucifixes in every corner." Yet how truly, how practically, are the Father and the Son denied by this great apostasy,—the commands of the Father trampled on and broken,—the second commandment generally left out altogether,—the tenderness, and grace, and sympathy of the Son denied, and transferred to the Virgin Mary, while Christ is represented as a solemn Judge only. God preserve us from all these snares of the enemy to destroy our souls! What Socinianism does explicitly Popery does covertly; both set aside Christ.]

Fifthly. We ought to contend earnestly for the faith, in opposition to those who would corrupt or deprave it—such as are "crept in unawares;" a wretched character to be sure, but often very ill applied by weak and ignorant people, and even by those who themselves creep in unawares, who think their ipse dixit should stand for a law to all their followers and admirers. Surely faithful, humble ministers, are helpers of their people's joy, peace, comfort, not lords of their faith. Whoever attempt to corrupt the faith, we ought to contend earnestly against them. The more busy and crafty the instruments and agents of Satan are to rob us of the truth, the more solicitous should we be to hold it fast; always provided we be very sure that we fasten no wrong or injurious characters on persons, parties, or sentiments.

The fair warning which the apostle, in Christ's name, gives to those who, having professed his holy religion, do afterwards desert and prove false to it.

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not. 6 And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness unto the judgment of the great day. 7 Even as Sodom and Gomorrha, and the cities about them in like manner, giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

We have here a recital of the former judgments of God upon sinners, with design to awaken and terrify those to whom warning is given in this epistle. Observe, The judgments of God are often denounced and executed in terrorem,—"for warning to others," rather than from immediate or particular displeasure against the offenders themselves; not that God is not displeased with them, but perhaps not more with them than with others, who, at least for the present, do escape. "I will put you in remembrance." Observe, that what we do already know we still need to be put in remembrance of. Therefore there will always be need and use of a standing, stated ministry in the Christian church, though all the doctrines of faith, the essentials, are so plainly revealed in express words, or by the most near plain, and immediate consequence, that he who runs may read and understand them. There want no infallible interpreters (really or conceitedly such) for any such end or purpose. Some people do, weakly enough, suggest, if the Scriptures do so plainly contain all that is necessary to salvation, what need or use can there be of a standing ministry? Why may we not content ourselves with staying at home and reading our Bibles? But hold, not so fast; fair and softly. The inspired apostle has here fully, though not wholly, answered this objection. Preaching is not designed to teach us something new in every sermon, somewhat that we knew nothing of before; but to put us in remembrance, to call to mind things forgotten, to affect our passions, and engage and fix our resolutions, that our lives may be answerable to our faith. Though you know these things, yet, as good Mr. Henry says, you still need to know them better. There are many things we have known which yet we have unhappily forgotten. Is it of no use or service to be put afresh in remembrance of them?

Now what are these things (I use the very words of the late excellent Mr. Henry, which in this exposition, which is designed, and accordingly modelled, as a small part of the continuation of his, I always do, where I well can) which we Christians need to be put in remembrance of.

First. The destruction of the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, ver. 5. St. Paul puts the Corinthians in mind of this, 1 Cor. x. The first ten verses of that chapter, as the Scripture is always the best commentary upon itself, are the best explication of the 5th verse of this epistle of Jude. None, therefore, ought to presume upon their privileges, since many who were brought out of Egypt by a series of amazing miracles yet perished in the wilderness, by reason of their unbelief. "Let us not therefore be high-minded, but fear," Rom. xi. 20. "Let us fear lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest any of you should seem to come short of it," Heb. iv. 1. They had miracles in plenty, they were, as Mr. Henry styles it, their daily bread, yet even they perished in unbelief. We have greater, much greater, advantages than they had. Let their error, their so fatal error, be our awful warning. [The constant recollection of God's truth is needful for its sanctifying and saving power, 1 Cor. xv. 2. Let us then read the Bible constantly. May we Protestant churches, who have been saved out of popery, be preserved from infidelity.]

Secondly. We are here put in remembrance of the fall of the angels, ver. 6. There were a great number of the angels who "left their own habitation;" that is, who were not pleased with the posts and stations the supreme Monarch of the universe had assigned and allotted to them, but thought (like discontented ministers in our age, I might say in every age) they deserved better. They would, with the title of ministers, be sovereigns, and in effect the Sovereign should be their minister—do all, and only what they would have him. Thus was pride the main and immediate cause or occasion of their fall. Thus they quitted their post, and rebelled against God, their Creator and Sovereign Lord. But God did not spare them, high and great as they were; he would not truckle to them; he threw them off, as a wise and good prince will a selfish and deceitful ministry; and the great, the all-wise God, could not be ignorant, as the wisest and best of earthly princes often are, what designs they were hatching. After all what became of them? They thought to have dared and out-faced Omnipotence itself; but God was too hard for them; he cast them down to hell. They who would not be servants to their Maker and his will in their first state, were made captives to his justice, and are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness. Here see what the condition of fallen angels is—they are in chains bound under the Divine power and justice, bound over to "the judgment of the great day." They are under darkness who were once angels of light. So horribly in the dark are they that they continue to fight against God, as if there were yet some small hope at least left them of prevailing and overcoming in the conflict. Dire infatuation! Light and liberty concur, chains and darkness, how well do they agree, and suit each other! [Whenever we admit a sin into our soul we place a chain on our freedom, and make a dungeon for our souls, and this, in its nature, everlasting. How terrible then the chains of pride, ambition, love of dominion, and hatred of God, and his truth, and his people, and of every thing good, which imprison evil angels with all their high intellect in eternal darkness!] The devils, once angels in the best sense, are reserved, &c. Observe, There is, undoubtedly there is, a judgment to come. The fallen angels are reserved to "the judgment of the great day;" and shall fallen men escape it? Surely no. Let every reader consider this in due time. Their chains are called everlasting, because it is impossible they should ever break loose from them, or make an escape. They are held fast and sure under them. The decree, the justice, the wrath of God are the very chains under which fallen angels are held so fast. Hear and fear, O sinful mortals of mankind!

Thirdly. The apostle here calls to our remembrance the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha, ver. 7. "Even as," &c. And it is in allusion to the destruction of Pentapolis, or the five cities, that the miseries of the damned are set forth by a lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. They were guilty of abominable wickedness, not to be named or thought of but with the utmost abhorrence and detestation. Their ruin is a particular warning to all people to take heed of, and fly from, "fleshly lusts which war against the soul," 1 Pet. ii. 11. [See the warnings given from the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha and the cities of the plain, Admah and Zeboim, Deu. xxix. 19–25; Eze. xvi. 48–51. These lusts consumed the Sodomites with fire from heaven, and they are now "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire;" therefore take heed, imitate not their sins, lest the same plagues overtake you as did them. God is the same holy, just, pure Being now as then. And can the beastly pleasures of a moment make amends for your "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire?" "Stand in awe, therefore, and sin not," Ps. iv. 4.

The charge the apostle exhibits against deceivers who were now seducing the disciples of Christ from the profession and practice of his holy religion.

8 Likewise also these filthy dreamers defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. 9 Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee. 10 But these speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves. 11 Woe unto them! for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the plied?" "Peculiar (as used in the salutation) to Jude, and 1 and 2 Peter" (Webster and Wilkinson).

3. "Common salvation." it was a salvation in which all classes and conditions of men were interested, and this common interest between himself and his hearers constituted the ground of his addressing them. "Once;" rather, "once for all." No other faith or revelation to supersede it. St. Jude means that having intended to write generally of the common salvation, he found it necessary from the existing evils in the Church to write especially that they should contend for the faith against those evils.

4. "Of old ordained;" rather, "fore-written"—i.e., in the Old Testament prophecies and those of the New Testament which had been already written. The passage certainly does not mean that God's eternal purpose had appointed these individuals to judgment, but, as all Scripture, in the punishments it recounts, teaches, that such characters are ordained to condemnation.

gainsaying of Core. 12 These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear: clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; 13 Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame; wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

WANDERING STARS.

He calls them "filthy dreamers," forasmuch as delusion is a dream, and the beginning of, and inlet to, all manner of filthiness. Note, Sin is filthiness. It renders men odious and vile in the sight of the most holy God; and makes them, sooner or later, as penitent or as punished to extremity, and without resource, vile in their own eyes; and in a while they become vile in the eyes of all about them. These filthy dreamers dream themselves into a fool's paradise on earth, and into a real hell at last. Let their character, course, and end be our reasonable and sufficient warning. Like sins will produce like punishments and miseries.

First. Here the character of these deceivers is described.

1. They "defile the flesh." The flesh or body is the immediate seat, and often the irritating occasion, of many horrid pollutions; yet these, though done in and against the body, do greatly defile, and grievously maim and wound, the soul; "Fleshly lusts do war against the soul," 1 Pet. ii. 11. And in 2 Cor. vii. 1, we read of filthiness of flesh and spirit, each of which, though of different kinds, defile the whole man.

2. They "despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities." Are of a disturbed mind, and a seditious spirit; forgetting that "the powers that be are ordained of God," Rom. xiii. 1. God requires us "to speak evil of no man," Tit. iii. 2. But it is a great aggravation of the sin of evil-speaking when what we say is pointed at magistrates, men whom God has set in authority over us, by blaspheming or speaking evil of whom we blaspheme God himself. Or, if we understand it with respect to religion, as some do, that ought to have the dominion in this lower world, such evil-speakers despise the dominion of conscience, make a jest of it, and would banish it out of the world; and for the word of God, the rule of conscience, they despise that; the revelations of the divine will go for little with them; they are a rule of faith and manners, but not till they have explained them, and imposed their sense of them upon all about them. Or, as others account for the sense of this passage, the people of God, truly and specially so, are the dignities here spoken of, or referred to; according to that of the psalmist, Psa. cv. 15, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." They "speak evil of," &c. Observe, Religion, and its serious professors, have been always and every where evil-spoken of; though there is nothing in religion but what is very good, and deserves our highest regards, both as it is perfective of our natures and subservient to our truest and highest interests; yet this sect, as its enemies are pleased to call it, "is every where spoken against," Acts xviii. 22.

On this occasion the apostle brings in "Michael the archangel," &c., ver. 9. Interpreters are at a loss what is here meant by "the body of Moses." Some think that the devil contended that Moses might have a public and honourable funeral, that the place where he was interred might be generally known, hoping thereby to draw the Jews, so naturally prone thereto, to a new and fresh instance of idolatry. Dr. Scott thinks that by "the body of Moses" we are to understand the Jewish church, whose destruction the devil strove and contended for; as the Christian church is called the body of Christ in the New Testament style. Others bring other interpretations, which I will not here trouble the reader with. [There is not merely a conflict going on between men and men, but a higher and more mysterious conflict connected with it, in the heavenly places, Eph. vi. 12; and all our struggles with sin and Satan are matters of intense interest to angels. The account of the Lord's burying the body of Moses is given Deut. xxxiv. 5, 6. Probably the devil was already pre-anticipating his system of relics, by which he has in popery done so much evil in the church of Christ.] Though this contest was mighty eager and earnest, and Michael was victorious in the issue, yet he would not bring a "railing accusation" against the devil himself. He knew a good cause needed no such weapons to be employed in its defence. It is said, "He durst not bring," &c. Why durst he not? Not that he was afraid of the devil, but he believed God would be offended if, in such a dispute, he went that way to work; he thought it below him to engage in a trial of skill with the great enemy of God and man, which of them should outscold or outtrail the other. A memorandum, saith good Mr. Henry, to all disputants never to bring railing accusations into their disputes. Truth needs no supports from falsehood or scurrility. Some say, Michael would not bring a railing accusation against the devil, as knowing beforehand that he would be too hard for him at that weapon. Some think the apostle refers here to the remarkable passage we have Num. x. 7-14. Satan would have represented Moses under disadvantageous colours, which he, good man, had, at that time, and upon that occasion, given but too much handle for. Now Michael, according to this account, stands up in defence of Moses, and in the zeal of an upright and bold spirit says to Satan, "The Lord rebuke thee." He would not stand disputing with the devil, nor enter into a particular debate about the merits of that special cause. He knew Moses was his fellow-servant, a favourite of God, and he would not patiently suffer him to be insulted, no, not by the prince of devils, but in a just indignation cries out, "The Lord rebuke thee." Like that of our Lord himself, Mat. iv. 10, "Get thee hence, Satan." Moses was a dignitary, a magistrate, one beloved and preferred by the great God; and the archangel thought it insufferable that such a one should be so treated by a vile apostate spirit, of how high an order soever. So the lesson hence is, that we ought to stand up in defence of those whom God owns, how severe soever Satan and his instruments are in their censures of them and their conduct. They who censure, in particular, upright magistrates upon every slip in their behaviour, may expect to hear, "The Lord rebuke thee;" and Divine rebukes are harder to be borne than careless sinners now think for.

3. But these speak evil of the things which they know not," &c., ver. 10. Observe. They who speak evil of religion and godliness speak evil of the things which they know not; for if they had known them they would have spoken well of them; for nothing but good and excellent can be truly said of religion; and it is sad any thing different or opposite should ever be justly said of any of its professors. A religious life is the most safe, happy, comfortable, and honourable life that is. [The lawless call a righteous government, and restraint of evil, "tyranny." The papists call real religion "heresy."] Observe, That men are most apt to speak evil of those persons and things which they know least of. How many had never suffered by slanderous tongues if they had been better known; as on the other hand retirement screens some even from just censure. "But what they know naturally," &c. Observe, It is hard, if not impossible, to find any obstinate enemies to the Christian religion who do not, in their stated course, live in open or secret contradiction to the very principles of natural religion. This many think hard and uncharitable; but I am afraid it will appear too true in the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. The apostle likens such to brute beasts, though they often think and boast themselves if not the wisest, yet at least the wittiest part of mankind. "In those things they corrupt themselves;" that is, in the plainest and most natural and necessary things; things that he most open and obvious to natural reason and conscience, even in those things they corrupt, debase, and defile themselves. The fault, whatever it is, lies not in their understandings or apprehensions, but in their depraved wills, disordered appetites and affections. They could, and might, have acted better; but then they must have offered violence to those vile affections which they obstinately chose rather to gratify than mortify.

4. In ver. 11 he represents them as followers of Cain; and in ver. 12, 13, as atheistical and profane people, that thought little, and perhaps believed not much of God or a future world; as greedy and covetous, who so they could but gain present worldly advantages cared not what came next. Rebels to God and man, who, like Core, ran into attempts in which they must assuredly perish, as he did. [The sins of the last days concentrate all the errors and sins of preceding times, and so bring special woe. The "way of Cain," Gen. iv. 3-8, brizing the fruits of his labours as a sacrifice instead of the lamb; "the error of Balaam," loving money and seducing God's people; the "gainsaying of Korah," corrupt authority in the priesthood.]

Of these the apostle farther says—

1st. "These are spots in your feasts of charity," ver. 12—the Ἀγίαρ, or 'love feasts,' so much spoken of by the ancients. These happened, by whatever means, or mischance, to be admitted among them, but were spots in them, defiled and defiling. Observe, It is a great reproach, though unjust and accidental, to religion, when they who profess it, and join in the solemnest institution of it, are in heart and life unsuitable and even contrary to it. "These are spots." Yet how common in all Christian societies here on earth, the very best not excepted, are such blemishes. The more is the pity; the Lord remedy it in his due time and way, not in men's blind and rigorous way of plucking up the wheat with the tares. But in the heaven we are waiting, hoping, and preparing for, there is none of this mad work, none of these disorderly doings.

2nd. "When they feast with you they feed themselves without fear." Arrant gluttons no doubt they were, such as only minded the gratifying of their appetites with the daintiness and plenty of their fare. They had no regard to Solomon's caution, Pr. xxiii. 2. Mr. Henry's note on this passage is, in common eating and drinking a holy fear is necessary, much more in feasting; though we may sometimes be more easily and insensibly overcome at a common meal than at a feast; for, in the case supposed, we are less upon our guard, and sometimes, at least to some persons, the plenty of a feast is its own antidote—as to others it may prove a dangerous snare.

3rd. "Clouds they are without water," which promise rain in time of drought, but perform nothing of what they promise. Such is the case of formal professors, who at first setting out promise much, like early blossoming trees in a forward spring, but in conclusion bring forth little or no fruit. [God preserve us from a mere appearance of good—a mere show of religion without the reality.] "Carried about of winds," light and empty, easily driven about this way or that, as the wind happens to sit. Such are empty, ungrounded professors, an easy prey to every seducer. It is amazing to hear many talk so confidently of so many things of which they know little or nothing, and yet have not the wisdom and humility to discern and be sensible how little they know. How happy would our world be if men either knew more, or practically knew how little they know!

4th. "Trees whose fruit withereth," &c. Trees they are, for they are planted in the Lord's vineyard, yet fruitless ones. Observe, They whose fruit withereth may be justly said to be without fruit. As good never a whit as never the better. It is a sad thing when men seem to begin in the spirit and end in the flesh, which is almost as common a case as it is an awful one. The text speaks of such as being twice dead; one would think to be once dead were enough. We none of us, till grace renew us to a higher degree than ordinary, love to think of dying once, though this is appointed for us all. What then is the meaning of this being twice dead? Take Mr. Henry's answer, in his own words. They had been once dead in their natural, fallen, lapsed state; but they seemed to recover, and, as a man in a swoon, to be brought to life again, when they took upon them the profession of the Christian religion. But now they are dead again by the evident proofs they have given of their hypocrisy; whatever they seemed they had nothing truly vital in them. "Plucked up by the roots," as we commonly serve dead trees, from which we expect no more fruit. They are dead, dead, dead; why cumber they the ground? away with them to the fire.

5th. "Raging waves of the sea," ver. 13; boisterous, noisy, and clamorous; full of talk and turbulence, but with little, if any, sense or meaning. "Foaming out their own shame," creating much uneasiness to men of better sense and calmer tempers, which yet will in the end turn to their own greater shame and just reproach. The psalmist's prayer ought always to be that of every honest and good man; "Let integrity and uprightness preserve me," Psa. xxv. 21; and if it will not, let me be unpreserved. If honesty signify little now, knavery will signify much less, and that in a very little while. Raging waves are a terror to sailing passengers; but when they are got to port the waves are forgotten, as no longer in being. Their noise and terror is for ever ended.

6th. "Wandering stars;" planets that are erratic in their motions, keep not that steady, regular course the fixed ones do, but shift their stations, that one has sometimes much ado to know where to find them. This allusion carries in it a lively emblem of false teachers, who are sometimes here and sometimes there, so that one knows not where nor how to fix them. In the main things,

5-7. Containing examples of Divine judgments. First example, that of unbelieving Israel in the wilderness. Translate, "I wish to remind you, knowing as ye do all things (i.e., that I am referring to), shat Jesus," &c. "Afterward," rather, "secondly," indicating a second deed of the Lord following that of the deliverance out of Egypt.

6. Second example of Divine judgment. "Their first estate:" "This has been referred by some to Gen. vi. 2, according to the legendary, patristic interpretation, and the visions of the Book of Enoch (Jerome on Psa. cxxiv.). The splendid use made of the expression by Milton in 'Paradise Lost,' Book V., is worth noticing" (Webster and Wilkinson). Alford says we cannot explain the apparent difference between what is here stated and the description elsewhere given of the activity of the evil spirits. Another explanation is, "He means not literal chains and darkness, but figurative in this present world, where, with restricted powers at least, one would think something should be fixed and steady; and I should think this might be without infallibility, or any pretensions to it, in us poor mortals. In religion and politics, the great subjects of present debate, surely there are certain stamina in which wise and good, honest and disinterested men might agree, without throwing the populace into the utmost anguish and distress of mind, or blowing up their passions into rage and fury, without letting them know what they say, or whereof they affirm. [There is an appearance as of a real star, a true minister of Christ; but it is only a falling meteor, speedily going out in utter darkness.]

Secondly, The doom of these wicked people is declared: "To whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever." Observe, False teachers are to expect the worst of punishments in this and a future world. Not every one who teacheth by mistake any thing that is not exactly true, (for who then in any public assembly durst open a Bible to teach others, unless he thought himself equal or superior to the angels of God in heaven?) but he who prevaricates, dissembles, would lead others into by-paths and side-ways, that he may have opportunity to make a gain or prey of them; or, in the apostle's phrase, to make merchandise of them, 2 Pet. ii. 3. But enough of this. As for "the blackness of darkness for ever," I shall only say that this terrible expression, with all the horror it imports, belongs to false teachers, (truly, not slanderously, so called,) who corrupt the word of God, and betray the souls of men. And if this will not make both ministers and people cautious, I know not what will.

14 And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his saints, 15 To execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him. 16 These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts; and their mouth speaketh great swelling words, having men's persons in admiration because of advantage.

This prophecy of Enoch we have no mention made of in any other part or place of Scripture, yet now it is Scripture that there was such a prophecy; one plain text of Scripture is proof enough of any one point that we are required to believe, especially when relating to a matter of fact; but in matters of faith, necessary, saving faith, God has not seen fit (blessed be his holy name he has not,) to try us so far. There is no fundamental of Christian religion, truly so called, which we have not inculcated over and over in the New Testament, by which we may know what the Holy Ghost does, and consequently we ought to lay the greatest stress upon. Some say this prophecy of Enoch was preserved by tradition in the Jewish church; others that the apostle Jude was immediately inspired with the notice of it. Be that how it will, it is certain there was such a prophecy of ancient date, of long standing, and universally received in the Old Testament church; and it is a main point of our New Testament creed. [The account of Enoch, in Gen. v. 21-24, is very brief; but in Heb. xi. we learn that faith was the real root of his holy character; and here we see on what that faith was specially exercised. Through the long vista of five thousand years by faith he beheld the Lord's coming to judgment, and calls all men also to behold it.] Observe,

First, That Christ's coming to judgment was prophesied of as early as the middle of the patriarchal age, and was therefore even then a received and acknowledged truth. "The Lord cometh with his holy myriads," including both angels and the spirits of just men made perfect. What a glorious time will that be when Christ shall come with ten thousand of these! And we are told for what great and awful ends and purposes he will come so accompanied and attended; namely, to execute judgment upon all. Observe,

Secondly, It was spoken of then, so long ago, as a thing just at hand; behold, "the Lord cometh;" he is just a coming, he will be upon you before you are aware, and unless you be very cautious and diligent, before you are provided to meet him comfortably. He cometh, 1. To execute judgment upon the wicked. 2. To convince them. Observe, Christ will condemn none without precedent, trial, and conviction, such conviction as shall at least silence even themselves; they shall have no excuse or apology to make that they either can or dare then stand by. Then every mouth shall be stopped, the Judge and his sentence shall be, by all the impartial, approved and applauded, and even the guilty condemned criminal shall be speechless, though at present they want not bold and specious pleas, which they vent with all assurance and confidence; and yet it is sure that the mock trials of prisoners in the goal among themselves, and the real trial at the bar before the proper judge, soon appear to be very different things. [The certain judgment coming upon the wicked is a great help in evil days to a bold and close walk with God.]

I cannot pass this 15th verse without taking notice how often, and how emphatically, the word "ungodly" is repeated in it; no less than four times—ungodly men, ungodly sinners, ungodly deeds, and, as to the manner, ungodly committed. Godly or ungodly signifies little with men now a days, unless it be to scoff at and deride even the very expressions; but it is not so in the language of the Holy Ghost. Observe, Omissions as well as commissions must be accounted for in the day of judgment. Observe farther, Hard speeches of one another, especially if ill-grounded, will most certainly come into account at the judgment of the great day. Let us all take care in time. If thou, saith one of our good old puritans, smite a miscalled heretic, or a schismatic, and God find a real saint bleeding, look thou to it, how thou wilt answer it; it may be too late to say, before the angel, it was an error, Ecc. v. 6. I only here allude to that expression of the Divinely inspired writer.

In the 16th verse the apostle enlarges farther on the character of these evil men and seducers; "They are murmurers, complainers," &c. Observe, that a murmuring, complaining temper, indulged and expressed, lays men under a very ill character. Such are very weak at least, and for the most part very wicked. They murmur against God and his providence, against men and their conduct; they are angry at every thing that happens, and never pleased with their own state and condition in the world, as not thinking it good enough for them. Such "walk after their own lusts;" their will, their appetite, their fancy, is their only rule and law. Mr. Henry's note here is, that they who please their sinful appetites are most prone to yield to their ungovernable passions. [We may observe an awful likeness in the sinners before the deluge, in the time of Enoch, and sinners before the last fire: "As it was in the days of Noah, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man," Lu. xvii. 26, 27. How many, alas, in our day are speaking great swelling words of the wonders of arts and science, and improved knowledge, and admiring man more than God!]

The exhortation the apostle here gives to those to whom he wrote, which, with the doxology in the last two verses, concludes the epistle.

17 But, beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; 18 How that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts. 19 These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit. 20 But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, 21 Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. 22 And of some have compassion, making a difference: 23 And others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire; hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. 24 Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy, 25 To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

First. He calls them to remember how they had been forewarned: "But, beloved, remember," &c., ver. 17. Remember, take heed that ye think it not strange, namely, so as to stumble, and be offended, and have your faith staggered by it, that such people as the seducers before described and warned against should arise, and that early, in the Christian church,—seeing all this was foretold by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, and consequently the accomplishment of it in the event is a confirmation of your faith, instead of being in the least an occasion of shaking and unsettling you therein. Observe, 1. They who would persuade must make it evident that they sincerely love those whom they would persuade. Bitter words and hard usage never did nor ever will convince, much less persuade any body. [Christians are beloved of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; beloved of angels and of their fellow-Christians. One delightful, heavenly atmosphere of love embraces the whole family of God.] 2. The words which inspired persons have spoken or written, duly remembered and reflected on, are the best preservative against dangerous errors. This will always be so till men have learnt to speak better than God himself. 3. We ought not to be offended if errors and persecutions arise and prevail in the Christian church. This was foretold, and therefore we should not think worse of Christ's person, doctrine, or cross, when we see it fulfilled: see 2 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 3. Therefore we must not think it strange, but comfort ourselves with this, that in the midst of all this hurly-burly Christ will maintain his church, and make good his promise that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it," Mat. xvi. 18. [Jude, by referring to the testimony of the apostles, and especially of Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 3, shews that his own epistle was late among the writings of the New Testament. Mocking is the consummation of wickedness, Ps. i. 1. The expression "the last times," when compared with the words of Peter, "In the last days perilous times shall come," naturally lead our thoughts to the close of the Christian dispensation, before the Lord's coming, 2 Pet. iii. 3-10. The book of Revelation is a fuller exposition of these prophecies.] 4. The more religion is ridiculed and persecuted the faster hold we should take and keep of it. Being forewarned we should shew that we are forearmed under such trials; we should stand firm, and "not be soon shaken in mind," 2 Thes. ii. 2.

Secondly, He guards them against seducers, by a farther description of their odious characters: "These be they who separate," &c., ver. 19. Observe, 1. Sensualists are the worst separatists. They separate themselves from God, and Christ, and his church, to the devil, world, and flesh, by their ungodly courses and vicious practices, and that is a great deal worse than separation from any particular branch of the visible church, on account of opinions or modes and circumstances of external government or worship; though many can patiently bear with the former, while they are plentifully and almost perpetually railing at the latter, as if no sin were damnable but what they are pleased to call schism. [The Gospel is an uniting and not a separating religion. We must not separate from true churches of Christ or true Christians, holding and loving the great truths of the Gospel, even though there be many lesser differences, Rom. xiv. 1.] 2. That sensual men have not the Spirit, namely, of God and Christ, the Spirit of holiness, which whoever has not is none of Christ's, does not belong to him, Rom. viii. 9. 3. The worse others are the better should we endeavour and approve ourselves to be. The more busy Satan and his instruments are to pervert others in judgment or practice, the more tenacious should we be of sound doctrine and a good conversation, holding fast the faithful word, as we have been divinely taught, holding the mystery of faith in a pure conscience, Tit. i. 9; 1 Tim. iii. 9. [The highest and holiest duties of the Christian life may be carried on in the midst of a world lying in wickedness.]

Thirdly, He exhorts them to persevering constancy in truth and holiness.

1. "Building up," &c., ver. 20. Observe, The way to hold fast our profession is to hold on in it. Having laid our foundation well in a sound faith and a sincere, upright heart, we must build upon it, that is, make farther progress continually. And we should take care with what materials we carry on our building, namely, gold, silver, precious stones, not wood, hay, stubble, 1 Cor. iii. 12. Right principles and a regular conversation will stand the test even of the fiery trial; but whatever we mix of baser alloy, though we be in the main sincere, we shall suffer loss by it; and though our persons be saved, all that part of our work shall be consumed; and if we ourselves escape it will be with great danger and difficulty, as from a house on fire on every side.

2. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." Observe, 1st. Prayer is the nurse of and liberties, shut out from heaven, they, like condemned prisoners, await their doom."

7. "Even as:" rather, "how," depending on "I wish to remind you" (verse 5), and introducing the third example. "Strange flesh:" "other flesh than that appointed by God for the fulfilment of natural desire" (Alford). "Eternal fire:" "Undergoing the punishment, as may even now be seen, of eternal fire, of that fire which shall never be quenched" (Alford).

8. "Dreamers:" omit "filthy," and read, "these men dreaming" (compare 1 Thess. v. 6, 7), Scripture representing sinners as asleep. Bengel has well observed, "As a man dreaming seems to himself to be seeing and hearing many things, so the natural man's lusts are agitated by joy, distress, fear, and other passions; but he is a stranger to self-command. Hence, although he bring into play all the powers of reason, he cannot conceive the true liberty which the sons of light enjoy." This term ("dreamers") very faith; the way to build up ourselves in our most holy faith is to continue instant in prayer, Rom. xii. 12. 2nd. Our prayers are then most likely to prevail when we pray in the Holy Ghost; that is, under his guidance and influence, according to the rule of his word, with faith, fervency, and constant, persevering importunity. This is praying in the Holy Ghost, whether it be done by or without a set, prescribed form. [It is easy to repeat forms of prayer, or by the intellect to pray extempore, but there is no real prayer from the heart of fallen man except what the Holy Ghost inspires.]

3. "Keep yourselves," &c., ver. 21; that is, 1st. Keep up the grace of love to God in its lively, vigorous actings and exercises in your souls. 2nd. Take heed of throwing yourselves out of the love of God to you, or its delightful, cheering, strengthening manifestations. Keep yourselves in the way of God if you would continue in his love.

4. "Looking for the mercy," &c. Observe, 1st. Eternal life is to be looked for only through mercy. Mercy is our only plea, not merit; or if merit, not our own but another's, who has merited for us what otherwise we could have laid no claim to, nor have entertained any well-grounded hope of. 2nd. It is said, not only through the mercy of God as our Creator, but through the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ as Redeemer. All that come to heaven must come thither "through our Lord Jesus Christ," "for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved," but that of the Lord Jesus only, Acts iv. 12, compared with ver. 10. 3rd. That a believing expectation of eternal life will arm us against the snares of sin, 2 Pet. iii. 14. A lively faith of the blessed hope will help us to mortify our cursed lusts. [Continually realise God's love to your soul. Spell it out from the midst of your trials, and dwell in it, and rejoice in it every day. And after you have done all, look only for mercy, and mercy in Jesus, as your solid foundation of hope for eternal life.]

Fourthly. He directs them how to behave towards erring brethren; "And of some have compassion," &c., ver. 22, 23. Observe,

1. We ought to do all we can to rescue others out of the snare of the devil, that they may be saved from (or recovered, when entangled therein, out of) dangerous errors or pernicious practices. We are not only, under God, our own keepers, but every man ought to be, as much as in him lies, his brother's keeper. None but a wicked Cain will contradict this, Gen. iv. 9. We must watch over one another, faithfully, yet prudently, reprove each other, set a good example to all about us.

2. And this must be done "with compassion, making a difference." How is that? We must distinguish between the weak and the wilful. 1st. Of some we must have compassion, treat them with all tenderness, restore them in the spirit of meekness, not be needlessly harsh and severe in our censures of them and their actions, nor proud and haughty in our carriage towards them; not implacable, averse to reconciliation with them, or admitting them to the friendship they formerly had with us, when they give evident or even strongly hopeful tokens of a sincere repentance. If God hath forgiven them, why should not we? We infinitely more need his forgiveness than they do, or can do, ours, though perhaps neither they nor we are justly or sufficiently sensible of this. 2nd. "Others save with fear." Urging upon them the terrors of the Lord, endeavour to frighten them out of their sins; preach hell and damnation to them, so good Mr. Henry. But what if prudence and caution in administering even the most just and severe reproofs be what is primarily and chiefly here intimated? (I do but offer it.) As if he had said, 'Fear, lest you frustrate your own good intentions and best designs by rash and imprudent management, that you do not harden instead of reclaiming, even where greater degrees of severity are requisite than in the immediately foregoing instance.' We are often apt to overdo when we are sure we mean honestly, and think we are right in the main; yet the very worst are not needlessly, or rashly, or to extremity to be provoked, lest they be thereby farther hardened through our default. "Hating even the garment," &c.; that is, keeping yourselves at the utmost distance from what is or appears evil, and designing and endeavouring that others may do so too. Avoid, as Mr. Henry speaks, all that leads to sin, or that looks like sin, 1 Thes. v. 22.

Fifthly. The apostle concludes this epistle with solemn ascription of glory to the great God. Note, Whatever is the subject or argument we have been treating of, ascribing glory to God is fittest for us to conclude with, ver. 24, 25. Note farther, God is able, and he is as willing as able, to keep us from falling, and to present us faultless "before the presence of his glory;" not as those who have never been faulty, (for what has once been done can never be rendered undone, even by Omnipotence itself, for that implies a contradiction,) but as those whose faults shall not be imputed to their ruin, which, but for God's mercy, and a Saviour's merits, they might most justly have been. "Before the presence of his glory." Observe, 1. That the glory of the Lord will shortly be present. We now look upon it as distant, and too many look upon it as uncertain, but it will come, and it will be manifest and apparent; "Every eye shall see him," Rev. i. 7. This is now the object of our faith, but hereafter (and sure it cannot now be long to) it will be the object of our sense. When we now believe in him we shall shortly see to our unspeakable joy and comfort, or inexpressible terror and consternation, 1 Pet. i. 8. 2. That all real, sincere believers shall be presented, at the Lord Redeemer's appearance and coming, by him their glorious Head, to the Father, in order to his approbation, acceptance, and reward. "They were given him of the Father, and of all that were given him he has lost none, nor will lose any one, not an individual, a single soul, but will present them all perfectly holy and happy, when he shall surrender his mediatorial kingdom to his God and our God, his Father and our Father, Jno. vi. 39; xvii. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 24. [Our preservation from falling is founded on the ability of him who is omnipotent; however difficult, then, it is sure to all the sheep of Christ. The certain result of the Divine dispensations is, that every child of God shall be found faultless, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. O the fulness of joy to Christ the Lord, to holy angels, to all the saints, will that day bring!] 3. When believers shall be presented faultless, it will be with exceeding joy. Alas! now our faults fill us with fears, doubts, and sorrows. But be of good cheer; if we are sincere we shall be, our dear Redeemer has undertaken for it we shall be, presented faultless. Where there is no sin there will be no sorrow; where there is the perfection of holiness there will be the perfection of joy. Surely the God who can and will do all this is worthy to have glory, majesty, dominion, and power ascribed to him, both now and for ever. And to this we may well with the apostle fix our hearty Amen.

[With all my dislike of a certain ultraism in our church, let me not forget the obligation of contending earnestly for the faith—one leading and pre-eminent article of which I hold to be justification by faith alone: and yet the first deviation from the faith which our apostle here specifies, and most dwells upon, is the converting of God's grace unto sin, as if the doctrine of our Saviour were not a doctrine according to godliness and all purity. No doubt the denial of Jesus Christ, whether in his person or work, is also noted; but what is chiefly insisted on is the practical abuse of gospel mercy. Preserve me from all such abuses, O God—from vile lusts, from covetousness, from insolence, whether in thought or speech, against the authorities, whether of church or state. They are probably the ecclesiastical dignities which are here referred to; but how aptly may it often be said, that in speaking evil of them we speak of what we know not; we meddle with matters too high for us! What fearfully expressive images are here made use of—clouds without water, or having the semblance and the promise of what is good, whilst utterly void thereof—carried about of winds, the sport of every incitement—trees having the leaves of profession, but all the fruits of righteousness either withering or wanting—twice dead, the death in trespasses and sins before entering the church, the sins unto death of the irrecoverable backslider after it—stars of brilliancy and conspicuousness, it may be, wandering here and there, but soon to be extinguished for ever. Save me, O God, from such a moral and spiritual catastrophe as this! Root out my sensuality, and give me thy Spirit. Let me henceforth be habitual and diligent in practising that lesson of the inner man, the truly important one which is here given, for keeping my heart in the love of God. Let me build myself up both on the securities and sanctities of the faith—looking for mercy, yet praying for holiness—fearing God, yet hoping in his mercy. Thus the exercise of faith, and the presence of its objects to the mind, keep alive the gratitude, while the most holy character of these objects waking a kindred character in us, ensures the process that by looking unto God we become like unto God. Let the terrors of the Lord, so forcibly depicted in this chapter, keep me back from the ways of destruction—let the winning love and compassion of my Saviour maintain me in constant adherence to him, so that I may abide in him continually. To thy wisdom, O God, would I refer the whole conduct of my soul. Keep me from falling, and present me faultless before thy throne. Thus shall I indeed be preserved in Christ Jesus; and while on myself there would be realised the two clauses of the Bethlehem proclamation—"peace on earth and goodwill to men"—the last clause of "Glory to God in the highest" would have its illustrious verification.—Chalmers's Posthumous Works.] fitly describes various sects of mystics. Under the plea of advancing spiritual life, many of these have indulged in sensuality, and so defile the flesh; at other times this mysticism has identified itself with tenets inconsistent not with one form of civil government, but with all, and so has taught men to "despise dominion;" and further, its supporters, in forming low and gross conceptions of the celestial beings and their glories, have spoken evil of dignities. Thus has the spiritual hope of Christ's Church been degraded to the level of the sensual paradise of Mahomet.

9. Reference to Satan's former dignity withheld the archangel. (See Dan. x. 13, xii. 1; Rev. xii. 7.) On this contention Alford remarks, "St. Jude took the incident from primitive tradition, which tradition, slightly modified, is also given by the prophet Zechariah (iii. 1-8). That the incident is related as matter of fact is evident by the very form of it. That being thus related as matter of fact, it is matter of fact, is a conclusion which will or will not be made, according as we are persuaded of the authenticity of the epistle as a part of canonical Scripture, and according as we esteem that canonical Scripture itself."

11. "Cain:" following his selfish and envious nature. (See 1 John iii. 11-15.) "Balaam:" reckless of what it costs, they rush after gain like Balaam. Either "perished by gainsaying, as Korah," or "perished in (as included in) the gainsaying of Korah"—i.e., when we read of Korah we read of these too, as perishing after the same example. The three men here mentioned seem to represent three types of godlessness—self-sufficient pride, greedy avarice, and turbulent ambition.

12. "Spots;" rather, "rocks," threatening their love-feasts with shipwreck. Read "feasting with you, pasturing themselves." "Clouds," from which rain would be expected. "Trees whose fruit withereth;" rather, "trees of the late autumn." "Twice dead:" first, as they seem in winter; and secondly, when "plucked up by the roots." So these apostates had been dead in sin before their conversion, and were now dead, having become apostates. Observe the climax—not only without leaves and fruit, but dead; not only dead, but plucked up, and cast aside.

13. See Isa. lvii. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 17. "Wandering stars:" erratic comets, or meteors, blazing and passing away into darkness.

14. "It is not clear whether Jude is making a citation from a work already in the hands of his readers, or is employing a traditional prophecy not at that time committed to writing, but afterwards embodied in the apocryphal work named the Book of Enoch." "The seventh from Adam:" Enoch is called so to distinguish him from Enoch the son of Cain. (See Gen. iv. 17.) "Ten thousands of his saints:" literally, "in the midst of his holy myriads." These may therefore be angels or saints.

15. "To execute judgment:" rather, "to hold judgment"—i.e., to perform the office of a judge, and undertake universal, judicial administration. "Against him:" in 2 Pet. iii. 4 we have an example of this ungodly speaking against the Lord. The reference here may well include the hard speeches made against God's children, and so against God in their persons. Noah, Lot, the apostles and prophets, may furnish examples.

16. "Murmurers:" like the discontented and rebellious among the Israelites of old. (Compare 1 Cor. x. 10.) "Complainers:" those who find fault with their lot in life. "Great swelling words:" i.e., the language of insolent pride or boasting. (Compare 2 Pet. ii. 18.) Among such might be included those who insolently abused their Christian liberty, to gratify their uncurbed inclinations. "Having men's persons," &c.: i.e., paying court to the rich and powerful for the sake of their own interests.

17. "The words," &c.: warnings such as this are to be found in Acts xx. 29, 30; 2 Thess. ii. 3-12; 1 Tim. iv. 1; 2 Tim. iii. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 2, 3.

18. "Last time;" similar expressions are found in James v. 3; 2 Pet. iii. 3. See also 2 Tim. iii. 1; 1 Tim. iv. 1; Acts xx. 29. The phrase is used for the times of the Christian dispensation (Acts ii. 17; Heb. i. 2; 1 Pet. i. 20).

19. "The Spirit:" "The higher spiritual life of man's spirit in communion with the Holy Spirit" (Alford).

20. Resumption from verse 17.

23. Read "And some indeed convict when contending with you, but others save, snatching them from the fire, and others compassionate in fear, hating even," &c. "Avoiding all familiarity with them, as they would avoid touching the garment infected from the flesh of one who had died of pestilence."

AN EXPOSITION
REVELATION OF ST. JOHN

It ought to be no prejudice to the credit and authority of this book that it has been rejected by men of corrupt minds, such as Cerdon and Marcion, and doubted of by men of a better character; for that has been the lot of other parts of holy writ, and of the Divine Author of the Scripture himself. The image and superscription of this book is truly sacred and Divine; the matter of it agreeable with other prophetic books, particularly Ezekiel and Daniel; the church of God has generally received it, and found good counsel and great comfort in it.

[It is a remarkable circumstance, says Mr. Horne, that the authenticity of this book was very generally, if not universally, acknowledged during the first two centuries, and yet in the third century it began to be questioned. This seems to have been occasioned by some absurd notions concerning the Millennium, which a few well-meaning but fanciful expositors grounded on this book; which notions their opponents injudiciously and presumptuously endeavoured to discredit, by denying the authority of the book itself. So little, however, has this portion of holy writ suffered from the ordeal of criticism to which it has in consequence been subjected, that (as Sir Isaac Newton has long since remarked) there is no other book of the New Testament so strongly attested, or commented upon so early, as the Apocalypse. The external evidence for the authenticity and inspiration of the Apocalypse is to be collected from the same sources as the evidence for the other books of the New Testament, namely, from the testimonies of those ancient writers who, living at a period near to its publication, appear by their quotations or allusions to have received it as a part of sacred Scripture. And this evidence is so abundant and explicit, that—we are authorised to affirm that the Apocalypse has been generally received in all ages. To borrow the eloquent sentiments of Dr. Woodhouse,—‘We have seen its rise, as of a pure fountain, from the sacred rock of the apostolical church. We have traced it through the first century of its passage, flowing from one fair field to another, identified through them all, and every where the same. As it proceeded lower, we have seen attempts to obscure its sacred origin, to arrest or divert its course, to lose it in the sands of antiquity, or bury it in the rubbish of the dark ages. We have seen these attempts repeated in our own times, and by a dexterous adversary. But it has at length arrived to us, such as it flowed forth at the beginning.’ The internal evidence we may reduce to three points. 1. The Apocalypse corresponds in doctrine and imagery with other books of Divine authority. 2. The sublimity of the ideas and imagery is another striking internal evidence of the genuineness and Divine origin of the Apocalypse. 3. The style of the Apocalypse coincides with the style of the undisputed writings of St. John. For farther evidences of the genuineness of this book, see Horne’s Introduction, iv. 479, where also is an account of larger works on the same subject. See also Preliminary Essay, and Appendix to Elliott’s Horæ Apocalyptice, vol. i.]

From the beginning the church of God has been blessed with prophecy. That glorious prediction of breaking the serpent’s head was the stay and support of the patriarchal age, and the many prophecies there were concerning the Messiah to come were the Gospel of the Old Testament. Christ himself prophesied of the destruction of Jerusalem; and about the time in which that was accomplished he entrusted the apostle John with this book of Revelation, to deliver it to the church as a prediction of the most important events that should happen to the end of time, for the support of the faith of his people and the direction of their hope. [As to the time when this book was written, the most probable and generally received opinion is, that John was banished into Patmos towards the end of Domitian’s reign, by virtue of his edicts for persecuting the Christians, and that he had the Revelations contained in the Apocalypse during his exile; though the book itself could not have been published until after the apostle’s release and return to Ephesus. Domitian’s death is related to have happened in September, A.D. 96. The Christian exiles were then liberated, and John was permitted to return to Ephesus. As, however, the emperor’s decease, and the permission to return, could not be known in Asia immediately, some time must intervene before the apostle could be at liberty either to write the Apocalypse at Ephesus, or to send it by messengers from Patmos. We conclude, therefore, with Turretin, Mosheim, Dr. Mill, Le Clerc, Basnage, Dr. Lardner, Bishop Tomline, Dr. Woodhouse, Neander, Elliott, and other eminent critics, in placing the Apocalypse in the year 96 or 97. It is important to bear this in mind in the perusal of the following Exposition, as the author, by giving an earlier date, has been led to apply predictions to events, such as the destruction of Jerusalem, which, if the date above assigned be correct, had previously taken place.] It is called the Revelation, because God therein discovers those things which could never have been sifted out by the reasonings of human understanding; those deep things of God which no man knows, and the Spirit of God, and those to whom he reveals them.

• By the Rev. W. Tong. See Preface to Vol. III.

Introductory Note.—The question of the canonical authority of the Book of Revelation is identical with the question of its authorship. The book for almost two centuries was accepted as St. John’s. The doubt then suggested has found supporters in later times, but it seems next to impossible to overlook the fact that the writer represents himself as John the Evangelist. If to the claim advanced by the writer be added the weight of historical evidence, commencing with the early witness of Papias (himself a hearer of St. John and a friend of Polycarp), and supported since that date (A.D. 116) by the testimonies of Justin Martyr (A.D. 150), the author of the Muratorian fragment (A.D. 170), Melito of Sardis (same date), Eusebius, Theophilus of Antioch, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and followed in the third and fourth centuries by Ephrem Syrus, Basil, Athanasius, Augustine, and Jerome, we shall not be surprised that there has been claimed “an overwhelming weight of testimony in favour of the canonical authority and authorship of this book.”

CHAPTER I.

This chapter is a general preface to the whole book, and contains. I. An inscription, declaring the original and the design of it, ver. 1, 2. II. The apostolical benediction pronounced on all those that shall pay a due regard to the contents of this book, ver. 3—8. III. A glorious vision or appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ to the apostle John, when he delivered to him this Revelation, from ver. 9 to the end of the chapter.

HE Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John: 2 Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw.

Here we have,

First. What we may call the pedigree of this book.

1. It is the revelation of Jesus Christ. The whole Bible is so; for all revelation comes through Christ, and all centres in him; and especially in these last days God has spoken to us by his Son, and concerning his Son. Christ, as the King of his church, has been pleased thus far to let his church know by what rules and methods he will proceed in his government; and, as the Prophet of the church, he has made known to us the things that shall be hereafter.

2. It is a revelation which God gave unto Christ. Though Christ is himself God, and as such has light and life in himself, yet, as he sustains the office of Mediator between God and man, he receives his instructions from the Father. The human nature of Christ, though endowed with the greatest sagacity, judgment, and penetration, yet could not in a way of reason discover these great events, which not being produced by natural causes, but wholly depending upon the will of God, could only be the object of Divine prescience, and must come to a created mind only by revelation. Our Lord Jesus is the great trustee of Divine revelation; it is to him we owe the knowledge we have of what we are to expect from God, and what he expects from us.

3. This revelation Christ sent and signified by his angel. Observe here the admirable order of Divine revelation. God gave it to Christ, and Christ employed an angel to communicate it to the churches. The angels are God's messengers; they are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation; they are Christ's servants. Principalities and powers are subject to him; all the angels of God are obliged to worship him.

4. The angel signified it to the apostle John. As the angels are the messengers of Christ, the ministers are the messengers of the churches; what they receive from heaven they are to communicate to the churches. John was the apostle chosen for this purpose. Some think he was the only one surviving, the rest having sealed their testimony with their blood. This was to be the last book of Divine revelation, and therefore notified to the church by the last of the apostles. John was the beloved disciple; he was under the New Testament as the prophet Daniel under the Old, a man greatly beloved. He was the servant of Christ; he was an apostle, an evangelist, and a prophet; he served Christ in all the three extraordinary offices of the church. James was an apostle, but not a prophet nor evangelist; Matthew was an apostle and evangelist, but not a prophet; Luke was an evangelist, but neither a prophet nor apostle; but John was all three, and so Christ calls him in an eminent sense his servant John.

5. John was to deliver this revelation to the church, to all his servants; for the revelation was not designed only for the use of Christ's extraordinary servants, the ministers, but for all his servants, the members of the church; they have all a right to the oracles of God, and all have their concern in them.

Secondly. Here we have the subject-matter of this revelation, namely, the things that must shortly come to pass. The evangelists give us an account of the things that are past, prophecy gives us an account of things to come. These future events are shewed, and not in the clearest light in which God could have set them, but in such a light as he saw most proper, and which would best answer his wise and holy purposes. Had they been as clearly foretold in all their circumstances as God could have revealed them, the prediction might have prevented the accomplishment; but they are foretold more darkly, to beget in us a veneration for the Scripture, and to engage our attention, and excite our inquiry. And we have in this revelation a general idea of the methods of Divine providence and government in and about the church, and many good lessons may be learned hereby. These events, it is said, were such as should not only come to pass surely, but shortly; that is, they would begin to come to pass very shortly, and the whole would be accomplished in a short time; for now the last ages of the world were come.

Thirdly. Here is an attestation of the prophecy, ver. 2. It was signified to John, who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw. It is observable that the historical books of the Old Testament have not always the name of the historian prefixed to them, as in the book of Judges, Kings, Chronicles; but in the prophetic books the name is always prefixed, as Isaiah, Jeremiah, &c. So in the New Testament, though John did not prefix his name to his first epistle, yet he does to this prophecy, as ready to vouch and answer for the truth of it; and he does not only give us his name but his office. He was one who bare record of the word of God in general, and of the testimony of Jesus in particular, and of all things that he saw; he was an eye-witness, and he concealed nothing that he saw. Nothing recorded in this revelation was his own invention or imagination; but all was the record of God, and the testimony of Jesus; and, as he added nothing to it, so he kept back no part of the counsels of God.

3 Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: for the time is at hand.

i. 1. "The Revelation of Jesus Christ:" i.e., the revelation belonging to him, and coming from him as his gift from the Father to us. God the Father gave it to the Son, and the Son to his Church. "Shortly:" from this word many of the Præterist school argue that the prophecies of the Apocalypse must all have been fulfilled within a comparatively short period of their first delivery. But the meaning of the word is amply satisfied by the immediate commencement of the early scenes of this great prophetic drama.

IHN to the seven churches which are in Asia: Grace be unto you, and peace, from him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and from the seven Spirits which are before his throne; 5 And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, 6 And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen. 7 Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen. 8 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.

We have here an apostolical benediction on those that should give a due regard to this Divine revelation; and this benediction is given more generally and more specially.

First. More generally, to all that either read or hear the words of the prophecy. This blessing seems to be pronounced with a design to encourage us to study this book, and not be weary of looking into it upon the account of the obscurity of many things in it; it will repay the labour of the careful and attentive reader. Observe, 1. It is a blessed privilege to enjoy the oracles of God. This was one of the principal advantages the Jews had above the Gentiles. 2. It is a blessed thing to study the Scriptures. They are well employed that search the Scriptures. 3. It is a privilege not only to read the Scriptures ourselves, but to hear them read by others, who are qualified to give us the sense of what they read, and to lead us into an understanding of them. 4. It is not sufficient to our blessedness that we read and hear the Scriptures, but we must keep the things that are written; we must keep them in our memories, in our minds, in our affections, and in practice, and we shall be blessed in the deed. 5. The nearer we come to the accomplishment of the Scriptures, the greater regard we should give unto them. The time is at hand, and we should be so much the more attentive as we see the day approaching.

Secondly. The apostolical benediction is pronounced more specially, and particularly to the seven Asiatic churches, ver. 4. These seven churches are named in ver. 11, and distinct messages sent to each of them respectively in the chapters following. The apostolical blessing is more expressly directed to these, because they were nearest to him, who was now in the isle of Patmos, and perhaps he had the peculiar care of them and superintendency over them, not excluding any of the rest of the apostles, if any of them were now living. Here observe,

1. What the blessing is which he pronounceth on all the faithful in these churches: grace and peace, holiness and comfort. Grace, that is, the goodwill of God towards us, and his good work in us; and peace, that is, the sweet evidence and assurance of this grace. There can be no true peace where there is not true grace; and where grace goes before, peace will follow.

2. From whence this blessing is to come. In whose name does the apostle bless the churches? Why, in the name of God, of the whole Trinity; for this is an act of adoration, and God only is the proper object of it; his ministers must bless the people in no name but his alone. And here, 1st. The Father is first named—God the Father; which may be taken either essentially for God as God, or personally, for the first person in the ever-blessed Trinity, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and he is described as the Jehovah, which is, and which was, and which is to come; eternal, unchangeable, the same to the Old Testament church which was, and to the New Testament church which is; and will be the same to the church triumphant which is to come. 2nd. The Holy Spirit, called the seven Spirits; not seven in number or in nature, but the infinite, perfect Spirit of God, in whom there is a diversity of gifts and operations. He is before the throne; for as God made, so he governs all things by his Spirit. 3rd. The Lord Jesus Christ. He mentions him after the Spirit, because he intended to enlarge more upon the person of Christ, as God manifested in the flesh, whom he had seen dwelling on earth before, and now saw again in a glorious form; and observe the particular account we have here of Christ, ver. 5. First. He is the faithful Witness. He was from eternity a witness to all the counsels of God, Jno. xi. 18, and he was in time a faithful witness to God's revealed will, who has now spoken to us by his Son, and upon his testimony we may safely depend, for he is a faithful witness, cannot be deceived, and cannot deceive us. Secondly. He is the first begotten or first-born from the dead, or the first Parent and Head of the resurrection, the only one that raised himself by his own power, and who will by the same power raise up his people from their graves to everlasting honour. For he has begotten them again to a lively hope by his resurrection from the dead. Thirdly. He is the Prince of the kings of the earth. From him they have their authority; by him their power is limited, and their wrath restrained; by him their counsels are overruled, and to him they are accountable. This is good news to the church, and it is good evidence of the Godhead of Christ, who is King of kings and Lord of lords. Fourthly. He is the great Friend of his church and people; one that has done great things for them, and this out of pure disinterested affection; he has loved them, and in pursuance of that everlasting love he has, 1st. Washed them from their sins in his own blood. Sins leave a stain upon the soul, a stain of guilt and of pollution; nothing can fetch out this stain but the blood of Christ; and, rather than it should not be washed out, Christ was willing to

i. 2. "And of all things that he saw:" Alford, following the best MSS., omits "and," and renders "as much as he saw."

i. 3. "He that readeth:" understood by some of the public reader.

i. 4. "Asia:" i.e., not what we call Asia Minor, but the strip of western seaboard, in extent not more than one-third of Asia Minor. (Compare 1 Pet. i. 1; Acts ii. 9.) "Him which is to come:" this affirms not merely future existence, as the expressions "which is"

shed his own blood to purchase pardon and purity for them. 2nd. He has made them kings and priests to God and his Father. Having justified and sanctified them, he makes them kings to his Father, that is, in his Father's account, and with his approbation, and for his glory. As kings they overcome the world, mortify sin, govern their own spirit, conquer Satan, have power and prevalency with God in prayer, and shall judge the world. He hath made them priests, given them access to God, enabled them to enter into the holiest, and to offer spiritual and acceptable sacrifices; has given them an unction suitable to this character; and for these high honours and favours they are bound to ascribe to him dominion and glory for ever. Fifthly. He will be the Judge of the world; ver. 7, "Behold he cometh, and every eye shall see him." This book, the Revelation, begins and ends with a prediction of the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. We should set ourselves to meditate frequently upon the second coming of Christ, and keep it in the eye of our faith and expectation. John speaks as if he saw that day; "Behold he cometh," as sure as if you beheld him with your eyes. "He cometh with clouds," which are his chariot and pavilion. He will come publicly, every eye shall see him,—the eye of his people, the eye of his enemies, every eye, yours and mine. He shall come to the terror of those that pierced him, and have not repented, and of all that have wounded and crucified him afresh by their apostasy from him, and to the astonishment of the pagan world. For he comes to take vengeance on those that know not God, as well as on those that obey not the Gospel of Christ. Sixthly. This account of Christ is ratified and confirmed by himself, ver. 8, in which our Lord Jesus justly challenges the same honour and power that is ascribed to the Father, ver. 4. He is the beginning and the end; all things are from him and for him; he is the Almighty; he is the same eternal and unchangeable One. And surely, whoever presumes to blot out one character of this name of Christ deserves to have his name blotted out of the book of life. They that honour him he will honour; but they that despise him shall be lightly esteemed.

9 I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. 10 I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, 11 Saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and, What thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea. 12 And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; 13 And in the midst of the seven candlesticks one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. 14 His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; 15 And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters. 16 And he had in his right hand seven stars: and out of his mouth went a sharp twoedged sword: and his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength. 17 And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last: 18 I am he that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death. 19 Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter; 20 The mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches.

We are now come to that glorious vision that the apostle had of the Lord Jesus Christ, when he came to deliver this revelation to him. Where observe, First. The account given of the person who was favoured with this vision. And he describes himself,

1. By his present state and condition. He was the brother and companion of these churches in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Christ. He was at this time, as the rest of true Christians were, a persecuted man, banished and perhaps imprisoned, for his adherence to Christ. He was their brother, though an apostle. He seems to value himself upon his relation to the church, rather than his authority in it. Judas may be an apostle, but not a brother in the family of God; he was their companion. The children of God should choose communion and society with each other. He was their companion in tribulation. The persecuted servants of God do not suffer alone, the same trials are accomplished in others. He was their companion in patience; not only a sharer with them in suffering circumstances, but in suffering graces. If we have the patience of the saints, we should not grudge to meet with their trials. He was their brother and companion in the patience of the kingdom of Christ, a sufferer for Christ's cause, for asserting his kingly power over the church and the world, and for adhering to it against all that would usurp upon it. By this account he gives of his present state he acknowledges his engagements to sympathise with them, and to endeavour to give them counsel and comfort, and bespeaks their more careful attention to what he had to say to them from Christ their common Lord.

2. By the place where he was when he was favoured with this vision. He was in the isle Patmos. He does not say who banished him thither. It becomes Christians to speak sparingly and modestly of their own sufferings. Patmos is said to be an island in the Ægean Sea, one of those called Cyclades, [it is now called Palmosa, is a rocky and bare island, about eighteen miles in circumference, sixteen miles north-west from Samos, and the inhabitants amount to between four and five thousand,] and was about thirty-five miles in compass; but under this confinement it was the apostle's comfort that he did not suffer as an evil-doer, but it was for the testimony of Jesus, for bearing witness to Christ as the Emmanuel, the Saviour. This was a cause worth suffering for; and the Spirit of glory and of God rested upon this persecuted apostle.

3. The day and time in which he had this vision. It was the Lord's day; the day which Christ had separated and set apart for himself, as the eucharist is called the Lord's supper. Surely this can be no other than the Christian sabbath,—the first day of the week, to be observed in remembrance of the resurrection of Christ. Let us who call him our Lord honour him on his own day, the day which the Lord hath made, and in which we ought to rejoice.

4. The frame that his soul was in at this time. He was in the Spirit; he was not only in a rapture when he received the vision, but before he received it; he was in a serious, heavenly, spiritual frame, under the blessed, gracious influences of the Spirit of God. God usually prepares the souls of his people for uncommon manifestations of himself by the quickening, sanctifying influences of his good Spirit. Those that would enjoy communion with God on the Lord's day must endeavour to abstract their thoughts and affections from flesh and fleshly things, and be wholly taken up with things of a spiritual nature.

Secondly. The apostle gives an account of what he heard when thus in the Spirit. An alarm was given as with the sound of a trumpet, and then he heard a voice, the voice of Christ, applying to himself the character before given, the First and the Last, and commanding the apostle to commit to writing the things that were now to be revealed to him, and to send it immediately to the seven Asiatic churches, whose names are mentioned. Thus our Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, gave the apostle notice of his glorious appearance as with the sound of a trumpet.

Thirdly. We have now an account of what he saw. He turned to see the voice, whose it was and whence it came, and then a wonderful scene of vision opened itself to him.

1. He saw a representation of the church under the emblem of seven golden candlesticks, as it is explained in the last verse of the chapter. The churches are compared to candlesticks, because they hold forth the light of the Gospel to advantage. The churches are not candles.—Christ only is our light, and his Gospel our lamp; but they receive their light from Christ and the Gospel, and hold it forth to others. They are golden candlesticks, for they should be precious and pure, comparable to fine gold. Not only the ministers, but the members of the churches ought to be such; their light should so shine before men as to engage others to give glory to God.

2. He saw a representation of the Lord Jesus Christ in the midst of the golden candlesticks; for he has promised to be with his churches always to the end of the world, filling them with light, and life, and love, for he is the very animating, informing soul of the church. And here we observe,

1st. The glorious form in which Christ appeared in several particulars. First. He was clothed with a garment down to the foot, a princely and priestly robe, denoting righteousness and honour. Secondly. He was girt about with a golden girdle, the breastplate of the high priest, on which the names of his people are engraven. He was ready girt to do all the work of a Redeemer.

Thirdly. His head and hairs were white, like wool or snow. He was the Ancient of days; his hoary head was no sign of decay, but it was indeed a crown of glory. Fourthly. His eyes were as a flame of fire, piercing and penetrating into the very hearts and reins of men, scattering terrors among his adversaries. Fifthly. His feet were like unto fine burning brass, strong and stedfast, supporting his own interest, and subduing his enemies, and treading them to powder. Sixthly. His voice was as the sound of many waters, of many rivers falling in together. He can and will make himself heard to those that are afar off, as well as to those that are near. His Gospel is a profuent and mighty stream, fed by the upper springs of infinite wisdom and knowledge. Seventhly. He had in his right hand seven stars, that is, the ministers of the churches, who are under his direction, have all the light and influence from him, and are secured and preserved by him. Eighthly. Out of his mouth went a two-edged sword, his word, which both wounds and heals, strikes at sins on the right hand and on the left. Ninthly. His countenance was as the sun shining, its strength too bright and dazzling for mortal eyes to behold.

2nd. The impression this appearance of Christ made upon the apostle John, ver. 17. He fell at the feet of Christ as dead; he was overpowered with the greatness of that lustre and glory in which Christ appeared, though he had been so familiar with him before. How well is it for us that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, whose terrors shall not make us afraid, for none can see the face of God and live!

3rd. The condescending goodness of the Lord Jesus to his disciple, ver. 17. He laid his hand upon him, he raised him up. He did not plead against him with his great power, but he put strength into him, he spoke kind words to him.

First. Words of comfort and encouragement: "Fear not." He commanded away the slavish fears of his disciple. Secondly. Words of instruction; telling him particularly who he was that thus appeared to him. And here he acquaints him, 1st. With his Divine nature: "the First and the Last." 2nd. With his former sufferings: "I was dead." The very same that his disciples saw upon the cross dying for the sins of men. 3rd. With his resurrection and life: "I live and am alive for evermore."—have conquered death, and opened the grave, and am partaker of an endless life. 4th. With his office and authority: "I have the keys of hell and of death," a sovereign dominion in and over the invisible world, opening and none can shut, shutting so as that none can open; opening the gates of death when he pleases, and the gates of the eternal world, of happiness or misery, as the Judge of all, from whose sentence there lies no appeal. 5th. With his will and pleasure that John should write both the things he had seen, and the things that are, and that should be hereafter. 6th. With the meaning of the seven stars,— and "which was" had asserted the past and present existence, but strikes the key-note of the book. "For what is the key-note to this whole book? Surely it is 'I come quickly.' 'The world seems to have all things its own way, to kill my servants, but I come quickly.' With this announcement the book begins (chap. i. 7), with this it ends (chap. xxi. 7, 12, 20); and this is a constantly recurring note through it all (chaps. ii. 5, 16, iii. 11, vi. 17, xi. 18, xiv. 7, xvi. 15, xviii. 20). It is Christ's word of comfort, or, where they need it, of warning to his friends, of terror to his foes. We may say, indeed, that in some sort 'he which is to come' is a proper name of our Lord (Matt. xi. 3; Heb. x. 37; John i. 15, 27). Compare Mal. iii. 1; Hab. ii. 3" (Trench).

i. 5. "Him that loved us:" the old MSS. have the present tense, "who loveth us." "Washed us," some MSS. read "loosed us," but the parallel passage (chap. vii. 14) seems to favour the retention of the word "washed us," &c.

that they are the ministers of the churches; and of the seven candlesticks,—that they are the seven churches, to whom Christ would now send by him particular and proper messages.

[This is a glorious chapter, and one that I have ever valued for the strength and clearness of its attestations to the divinity of Christ. But let me first remark on the decisive announcement here given to the authorship of this prophecy, and also to the vast and urgent importance of the prophecy itself. Let me read it, O God, and O do thou enable me to apply it aright, and this under the solemn impression that the time is at hand. Give me, give me, O Lord, to keep and well to observe, both discerningly and earnestly, the things which are written therein. And now let me here note the concatenation of evidence which there is for the Godhead of our Saviour. One who is distinct from Jesus Christ, even God the Father, is spoken of as he which is, and which was, and which is to come. Again, one, in ver. 8, even the Lord, announces himself as one which is, and which was, and which is to come—thus identifying himself, in the attribute of eternity at least, with him who is read of in the fourth verse. Again, in ver. 11, one announces himself by a voice which is heard behind him as Alpha and Omega, one of the clauses of description given of him who puts forth the utterance of ver. 8. And to do away the last and the least remainders of uncertainty, we have both the sight and hearing of the apostle, fixing it down that Jesus Christ is indeed the personage of ver. 8, 11, and 18; for he says of himself what is said of him in ver. 11, that he is the First and the Last; and further says, "I am he that liveth, and was dead"—thus completing the proof that Jesus is indeed the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending—the Almighty, ver. 8; and so the mighty God, Isa. ix. 6, as well as one in eternity with the everlasting Father.—Chalmers's Posthumous Works, vol. iv.]

CHAPTER II.

The apostle John having in the foregoing chapter written the things which he had seen, now proceeds to write the things that are according to the command of God, ch. i. 19; that is, the present state of the seven churches of Asia, with which he had a particular acquaintance, and for which he had a tender concern. He was directed to write to every one of them according to their present state and circumstances, and to inscribe every letter to the angel of that church, to the minister or rather ministry of that church, called angels because they are the messengers of God to mankind. In this chapter we have, I. The message sent to Ephesus, ver. 1—7; II. To Smyrna, ver. 8—11; III. To Pergamos, ver. 12—17; IV. To Thyatira, ver. 18 to the end.

AND to the angel of the church of Ephesus write; These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks; 2 I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil: and thou hast tried them which say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars: 3 And hast borne, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast laboured, and hast not fainted. 4 Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love. 5 Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent. 6 But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate. 7 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God.

We have here,

First, The inscription. Where observe,

[1. That Christ ordered the seven epistles to be sent to the seven churches, ch. i. 11. Therefore, though directed to the pastors, the churches themselves are to be considered as concerned and included in them. The admonition added at the close of each epistle to the churches intimates that the things written therein are to be applied to all other churches in every place and age.—Guyse.] 2. To whom the first of these epistles is directed: to the church of Ephesus, a famous church planted by the apostle Paul, Acts xix., and after that watered and governed by St. John, who had his residence very much there. We can hardly think that Timothy was the angel or sole pastor and bishop of this church at this time,—that he who was of a very excellent spirit, and naturally cared for the good state of the souls of the people, should become so remiss as to deserve the rebukes given to the ministry of this church.

[Ephesus was an ancient and celebrated city. Its temple, dedicated to the great goddess Diana, (Acts xix.) was one of the seven wonders of the world; and its theatre, now in ruins, (see wood engravings, 1 Cor. xv. 32; Eph. ii.), could have conveniently seated between twenty and thirty thousand persons. Contrasting the present and former state of Ephesus, there is sufficient room for astonishment at the mighty change. The plough has passed over the site of the city; and we saw the green corn growing in all directions, amidst the forsaken ruins. There is at present only one individual who bears the name of Christ!—and where, in the whole region, do we discover any semblance of primitive Christianity? The country once favoured with the presence of St. Paul, of Timothy, and St. John, is now in the situation of those lands of which it is said, "Darkness covers the earth, and gross darkness the people." He, then, "that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Observe,

3. From whom this epistle to Ephesus was sent. And here we have one of those titles that were given to Christ in his appearance to John in the chapter foregoing; namely, "He that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, and walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks," ch. i. 13, 16. This title consists of two parts. 1st. He that holds the stars in his right hand. The ministers of Christ are under his special care and protection. It is the honour of God that he knows the number of the stars, calls them by their names, binds the sweet influences of Pleiades, and looses the bands of Orion; and it is the honour of the Lord Jesus Christ that the ministers of the Gospel, who are greater blessings to the church than the stars are to the world, are in his hand; he directs all their motions, he disposes of them into their several orbs, he fills them with light and influence, he supports them, or else they would soon be falling stars; they are instruments in his hand, and all the good they do is done by his hand with them. 2nd. He walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks. This speaks his relation to his churches, as the other his relation to his ministers. Christ is in an intimate manner present and conversant with his churches; he knows and observes their state, he takes pleasure in them as a man does to walk in his garden. Though Christ be in heaven, he walks in the midst of his churches on earth, observing what is amiss in them, and what it is they want. And this is a great encouragement to those that have the care of the churches, that the Lord Jesus has graven them upon the palms of his hands.

Secondly, The contents of the epistle, in which, as in most of those that follow, we have,

1. The commendation Christ gave this church, ministers and members, which he always brings in, by declaring that he knows their works, and therefore both his commendation and reprehension are to be strictly regarded; for he does not in either speak at a venture; he knows what he says. Now the church of Ephesus is commended, 1st. For their diligence in duty; ver. 2, "I know thy works, and thy labour." This may more immediately relate to the ministry of this church, which had been laborious and diligent. Dignity calls for duty. Those that are stars in Christ had need to be always in motion, dispensing light to all about them. "For my name's sake thou hast laboured and hast not fainted," ver. 3. Christ keeps an account of every day's work, and every hour's work, his servants do for him, and their labour shall not be in vain in the Lord.

[Christ knows the thoughts, the secret springs of action, and the whole moral character of men. The knowledge thus asserted in the most solemn message to each of the churches is clearly shewn to include the most perfect acquaintance with the sincerity or hypocrisy of individuals, and with all the complication of human feelings and actions. This is real omniscience, and is again asserted in the strongest and plainest terms, ver. 23; and we find in ver. 6, and elsewhere, the Lord Jesus purifying, correcting, and rewarding the professors of religion, in pursuance of his perfect knowledge of their hearts and characters. The very nature of the acts specified implies a complete dominion over the arrangements of Providence—the present life, and its fullest powers in reference to the future state.—J. P. Smith.]

2nd. For their patience in suffering; ver. 2, "Thy labour and thy patience." It is not enough that we be diligent, but we must be patient, and endure hardness as good soldiers of Christ. Ministers must have and exercise great patience, and no Christian can be without it. There must be bearing patience to endure the injuries of men and the rebukes of Providence, and there must be waiting patience, that, when they have done the will of God, they may receive the promise, "Thou hast borne, and hast patience," ver. 3. We shall meet with such difficulties in our way and work as require patience to go on and finish well. 3rd. For their zeal against what was evil; ver. 2, "Thou canst not bear them that are evil." Where observe, it consists very well with Christian patience not to dispense with sin, much less allow it. Though we must shew all meekness to men, yet we must shew a just zeal against their sins. This their zeal was the more to be commended because it was according to knowledge, a discreet zeal upon a previous trial made of the pretences, practices, and tenets of evil men. "Thou hast tried them that say they are apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars." True zeal proceeds with discretion; none should be cast off till they be tried. Some were risen up in this church that pretended to be not ordinary ministers, but apostles; their pretensions had been examined, and found to be vain and false. Those that impartially search after truth may come to the knowledge of it.

2. The rebuke given to this church; ver. 4, "Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee." Those that have much good in them may have something much amiss in them, and our Lord Jesus, as an impartial Master and Judge, takes notice of both; though he first observes what is good, and is most ready to mention that, yet he also observes what is amiss, and will faithfully reprove them for it. The sin that Christ charged this church with is, their decay and declension in holy love and zeal. "Thou hast left thy first love;" not left and forsaken the object of it, but lost the fervent degree of it that at first appeared. Observe, 1st. The first affections of men towards Christ, and holiness, and heaven, are usually lively and warm. God remembered the love of Israel's espousals, when she would follow him whithersoever he went. 2nd. These lively affections will abate and cool, if great care be not taken, and diligence ing "glowing brass." To this the words which follow give force and plausibility.

i. 18. "Of hell and of death;" rather, "of death and of hades;" death being as it were the king, and hades, or the grave, his realm.

ii. 1. "Of Ephesus;" rather, "in Ephesus." The chief city of Ionia—"the light of Asia," "the chief of Asia." Smyrna and Pergamos had disputed with Ephesus the primacy of Asia, but in

i. 6. "Hath made us kings:" rather, "a kingdom, even priests unto God." The royal priesthood of the redeemed springs from that of the Redeemer, who is the King-Priest, the Melchizedek. (Compare Heb. vi. 20, vii. 21; Psa. cx. 4; Zech. vi. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 9.)

i. 15. "Fine brass:" the word is chalcobitanus. "The precise meaning," says Alford, "is unknown." Trench, however, adopts an explanation proposed by Bochart, which regards the word as a hybrid formation, the combination of a Greek word and a Hebrew, signify-used, to preserve them in constant exercise. 3rd. That Christ is grieved and displeased with his people when he sees them grow remiss and cold towards him, and he will one way or other make them sensible that he does not take it well from them.

3. The advice and counsel given them from Christ; ver. 5. "Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent," &c. 1st. Those that have lost their first love must remember from whence they are fallen; they must compare their present with their former state, and consider how much better it was with them then than now; how much peace, strength, purity and pleasure they have lost by leaving their first love; how much more comfortably they could lie down and sleep at night; how much more cheerfully they could awake in the morning; how much better they could bear afflictions, and how much more becomingly they could enjoy the favours of Providence; how much easier the thoughts of death were to them, and how much stronger their desires and hopes of heaven. 2nd. They must repent, they must be inwardly grieved and ashamed for their sinful declining; they must blame themselves, and shame themselves for it, and humbly confess it in the sight of God, and judge and condemn themselves for it. 3rd. They must return and do their first works; they must, as it were, begin again, go back, step by step, till they come to the place where they took the first false step; they must endeavour to revive and recover their first zeal, tenderness, and seriousness, and must pray as earnestly and watch as diligently as they did when they first set out in the ways of God. Now this good advice is forced and urged. First. By a severe threatening if it should be neglected; "I will come unto thee quickly, and remove thy candlestick out of its place." If the presence of Christ's grace and Spirit be slighted we may expect the presence of his displeasure; he will come in a way of judgment, and that suddenly and surprisingly upon impenitent churches and sinners; he will unchurch them, take away his Gospel, his ministers, and his ordinances from them, and what will the churches, or the angels of the churches, do when the Gospel is removed? Secondly. By an encouraging mention that is made of what was yet good among them; ver. 6. "This thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitanes, which I also hate." Though thou hast declined in thy love to what is good, yet thou retainest thy hatred to what is evil, especially to what is grossly so. The Nicolaitanes were a loose sect, that sheltered themselves under the name of Christianity; they held hateful doctrines, and they were guilty of hateful deeds, hateful to Christ and to all true Christians; and it is mentioned to the praise of the church of Ephesus that they had a just zeal and abhorrence of those wicked doctrines and practices. An indifference of spirit between truth and error, good and evil, may be called charity and meekness, but it is not pleasing unto Christ. Our Saviour subjoins this kind commendation to his severe threatening, to make the advice more effectual.

Thirdly. We have the conclusion of this epistle, in which, as in those that follow, we have,

1. A call to attention; "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." Observe, 1st. What is written in the Scriptures is spoken by the Spirit of God. 2nd. What is said to one church concerns all the churches, in every place and age. 3rd. We can never employ our faculty of hearing better than in hearkening to the word of God, and we deserve to lose it if we do not employ it to this purpose. And they that will not hear the call of God now will wish at length they had never had a capacity of hearing any thing at all.

2. Promise of great mercy to those that overcome. The Christian life is a warfare against sin, Satan, the world, and the flesh. It is not enough that we engage in this warfare, but we must pursue it to the end; we must never yield to our spiritual enemies, but fight the good fight till we gain the victory, as all persevering Christians shall do; and the warfare and victory shall have a glorious triumph and reward. That which is here promised is to "eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." They shall have that perfection of holiness, and that confirmation therein, that Adam should have had. If he had gone well through the course of his trial, then he should have eaten of the tree of life that was in the midst of paradise, and that would have been the sacrament of confirmation to him in his holy and happy state. So all that persevere in their Christian trial and warfare shall derive from Christ, as the tree of life, perfection and confirmation in holiness and happiness in the paradise of God; not in the earthly paradise, but the heavenly, ch. xxii. 1, 2.

8 And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna write; These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive; 9 I know thy works, and tribulation, and poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews, and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. 10 Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days: be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. 11 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.

We now proceed to the second epistle, sent to another of the Asiatic churches, where, as before, observe,

First. The preface or inscription in both parts.

1. The superscription, telling us to whom it was more expressly and immediately directed: to the angel of the church of Smyrna, a place well known at this day by our merchants, a city of great trade and wealth, perhaps the only city of all the seven that is still known by the same name, but now no longer a Christian church, but overrun with Mahometanism. The pastor of the church in Smyrna is supposed to have been Polycarp, who was burnt alive there, A.D. 167, and whom the exhortation in ch. ii. 10 would be peculiarly calculated to support and encourage. We visited the stadium where Polycarp was martyred for the truth, A.D. 167. It stands on the face of a hill, the sides of a concave valley forming a natural amphitheatre for the accommodation of spectators. Near it is a range of broken arches, which formed part of the vaults where the wild beasts were kept. From one of these the people urged the Ariarch to let loose a lion against Polycarp. In the midst of this stadium the aged man of God was fixed to a stake, and the fire kindled around him, but the flame leaving him unconsumed, he was dispatched by the sword of the Roman confector. This very stadium was the spot where his soul ascended up to heaven, "receiving his portion," according to his own prayer, "in the number of martyrs in the cup of Christ." After serving his Lord, and directing his flock, by his steps as well as by his voice, during eighty and six years, he was found faithful unto death, and received the crown of life. The epistle to the church of Smyrna seemed doubly interesting to us now; a voice seemed still to echo round the spot, "Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer!" A grave close by, over which a tall cypress grows, is said to be the grave of Polycarp.—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative. For wood engraving see end of book 1.

2. The subscription, containing another of the glorious titles of our Lord Jesus, the first and the last, he that was dead and is alive, taken out of ch. i. 17, 18. 1st. Jesus Christ is the first and the last. It is but a little scantling of time that is allowed to us in this world, but our Redeemer is the first and the last; he is the first, for by him all things were made, and he was before all things, with God, and was God himself. He is the last, for all things are made for him, and he will be the Judge of all. This surely is the title of God from everlasting to everlasting, and it is the title of one that is an unchangeable Mediator between God and man, Jesus, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. He was the first, for by him the foundation of the church was laid in the patriarchal state. And he is the last, for by him the top-stone will be brought forth and laid in the end of time. 2nd. "He was dead, and is alive." He was dead, and died for our sins; he is alive, for he rose again for our justification, and he ever lives to make intercession for us. He was dead, and by dying purchased salvation for us; he is alive, and by his life applies this salvation to us. And if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled by his death, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life. His death we commemorate every sacrament day, his resurrection and life every sabbath day.

Secondly. The subject-matter of this epistle to Smyrna, where, after the common declaration of Christ's omniscience and that perfect cognizance he has of all the works of men, and especially of his churches, he takes notice,

1. Of the improvement they had made in their spiritual state. This comes in, in a short parenthesis, but is very emphatical; "But thou art rich," ver. 9. Poor in temporals, but rich in spirituals; poor in spirit, and yet rich in grace; their spiritual riches are set off by their outward poverty. Many that are rich in temporals are poor in spirituals. Thus it was with the church of Laodicea. Some that are poor outwardly are inwardly rich,—rich in faith, in good works, rich in privileges, rich in bonds and deeds of gift, rich in hope, rich in reversion. Spiritual riches are usually the reward of great diligence; the diligent hand maketh rich. Where there is spiritual plenty, outward poverty may be better borne; and when God's people are impoverished in temporals for the sake of Christ and a good conscience, he uses to make all up to them in spiritual riches, which are much more satisfying and enduring.

2. Of their sufferings; "I know thy tribulation and thy poverty." The persecution they underwent, even to the spoiling of their goods. They that will be faithful to Christ must expect to go through many tribulations; but Jesus Christ takes particular notice of all their troubles; in all their afflictions he is afflicted, and he will recompense tribulation to those that trouble them, but to them that are troubled rest with himself.

3. He knows the wickedness and the falsehood of their enemies; "I know the blasphemy of them that say they are Jews, but are not;" and that is, 1st. Of those that pretend to be the only peculiar covenant people of God, as the Jews boasted themselves to be, even after God had rejected them. Or, 2nd. Of those that would be setting up the Jewish rites and ceremonies, that were now not only antiquated but abrogated. These may say they only are the church of God in the world, when indeed "they are the synagogue of Satan." Observe, First. That as Christ has a church in the world, the spiritual Israel of God, so the devil has his synagogue. Those assemblies that are set up in opposition to the truths of the Gospel, and that promote and propagate damnable errors; those that are set up in opposition to the purity and spirituality of gospel worship, and promote and propagate the vain inventions of men, and rites and ceremonies which never entered into the thoughts of God; and those assemblies which are set up to revile and persecute the true worship and worshippers of God,—these are all synagogues of Satan; he presides over them; he works in them, his interests are served by them, and he receives a horrid homage and honour from them. Secondly. For the synagogues of Satan to give themselves out to be the church or Israel of God is no less than blasphemy. God is greatly dishonoured when his name is made use of to promote and patronise the interests of Satan; and he has a high resentment of this blasphemy, and will take a just revenge on those that persist in it.

4. He foreknows the future trials of his people, and forewarns them of them, and forewarns them against them. 1st. He forewarns them of future trials; ver. 10. "The devil shall cast some of you into prison, and you shall have tribulation." The people of God must look for a series and succession of troubles in this world, and their troubles usually rise higher; they had been impoverished by their tribulations before, now they must be imprisoned. Observe, It is the devil that stirs up his instruments, wicked men, to persecute the people of God; tyrants and persecutors are the devil's tools, though they gratify their own sinful malignity, and know not that they are actuated by a diabolical malice. 2nd. Christ forewarns them against these approaching troubles. First. By his counsel,—"Fear none of these things." This is not only a word of command but of efficacy; not only forbidding slavish fear, but subduing it, and furnishing the soul with strength and courage. Secondly. By showing them how their sufferings would be alleviated and limited. 1st. They should not be universal; it would be some of them, not all, that should be cast into prison,—those that were best able to bear it, and might expect to be visited and comforted by the rest. 2nd. It was not to be perpetual, but for a set time, and a short time—ten days. It should not be everlasting tribulation, the time should be shortened for the elect's sake. 3rd. It should be to try them, not to destroy them, that their faith, and patience, and courage might be proved and improved, and be found to honour and glory. Thirdly. By proposing and promising a glorious reward to their fidelity; ver. 10. "Be thou faithful to death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Observe, 1st. The sureness of the reward; "I will give thee." He hath said it that is able to do it, and he has undertaken that he will do it. They shall have the reward from his own hand, and none of their enemies shall be able to wrest it out of his hand, or to pull it from their heads. 2nd. The suitableness of it. (1.) A crown to reward their poverty, and their fidelity, and their conflict. (2.) A crown of life to reward those that are faithful even unto death, are faithful till they die, and that part with life itself in fidelity to Christ; that life so worn out in his service, or laid down in his cause, shall be rewarded with another and a much better life, that shall be eternal. 3rd. The conclusion of this message, and that as before, (1.) With a call to universal attention, that all men, all the world, should hear what passes between Christ and his churches, how he commends them, how he comforts them, how he reproves their failures, how he rewards their fidelity. It concerns all the inhabitants of the world to observe God's dealings with his own people; all the world may learn instruction and wisdom thereby. (2.) With a gracious promise to the conquering Christian; ver. 11, "He that overcometh shall not the time of St. John the wealth and prosperity of Ephesus, its celebrated Temple of Diana, one of the seven wonders of the world, had set it far in advance of its competitors. St. Paul had laboured there for three years (Acts xx. 31); he had ordained Timothy to be bishop there. St. John made it the scene of his labours during the closing years of his life. Much had been given to Ephesus, much would be required.

ii. 5. "Remove thy candlestick;" it is mentioned by Trench that one who lately visited the ruins of Ephesus found in the vicinity only three Christians, and these sunken in such ignorance and apathy as scarcely to have heard the names of St. Paul or St. John.

ii. 6. "Nicolaitanes;" see Note on verses 14, 15.

ii. 7. "He that hath an ear;" these words occur in all the epistles, but with this difference, that in the former three they occur before, in the latter four after the final promise. Trench, who notices this difference in the position of the words, thinks it not be hurt of the second death." Observe, [1.] That there is not only a first, but second death, a death after the body is dead. [2.] This second death is unspeakably worse than the first death, both in the dying pangs and agonies of it, which are the agonies of the soul, without any mixture of support; and in the duration it is eternal death, dying the death, to die and to be always dying; this is hurtful indeed, it is fatally hurtful to all that fall under it. [3.] From this hurtful, this destructive death Christ will save all his faithful servants. The second death shall have no power over those that are partakers of the first resurrection. The first death shall not hurt them, and the second death shall have no power over them.

12 And to the angel of the church in Pergamos write; These things saith he which hath the sharp sword with two edges; 13 I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. 14 But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balac to cast a stumblingblock before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. 15 So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which thing I hate. 16 Repent; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth. 17 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

PERGAMOS.—VER. 12.

Here also we are to consider,

First. The inscription of this message.

1. Who it was sent to: to the angel of the church of Pergamos. Whether this was a city raised up out of the ruins of old Troy, a Troy novant, as our London was once called, or some other city of the same name, is neither certain nor material. It was a place where Christ had called and constituted a gospel church, by the preaching of the Gospel, and the grace of his Spirit, making the word effectual. [Pergamos was a town of the Great Mysia, the capital of a kingdom of the same name. Even now, under the name of Bergano, it is a place of considerable importance, containing a population estimated at 14,000, of whom about 3,000 are Greeks, 300 Armenians, and the rest Turks. It was the most warlike of all the cities, being the capital of the kingdom of Attalus, and hence perhaps the warlike strain in which it is addressed by him who had the two-edged sword.]

2. Who it was that sent this message to Pergamos: the same Jesus who here describes himself as one that hath the sharp sword with two edges; ch. i. 18, "Out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword." Some have observed that in the several titles of Christ, which are prefixed to the several epistles, there is something suited to the state of those churches, as in that to Ephesus. What could be more proper to awaken and recover a drowsy and declining church than to hear Christ speaking as one that held the stars in his hand, and walked in the midst of the golden candlesticks? &c.

The church of Pergamos was infested with men of corrupt minds, that did what they could to corrupt both the faith and manners of the church; and Christ being resolved to fight against them by the sword of his word, takes the title of him that hath the sharp sword with two edges. 1st. The word of God is a sword; it is a weapon both offensive and defensive; it is in the hand of God able to slay both sin and sinners. 2nd. It is a sharp sword; no heart so hard but it is able to wound it, no knot so closely tied but it is able to cut it; it can divide asunder between the soul and the spirit, that is, between the soul and those sinful habits that by custom are become another soul, or seem to be essential to it. 3rd. It is a sword with two edges; it turns and cuts every way. There is the edge of the law against the transgressors of that dispensation, and the edge of the Gospel against the despisers of that dispensation. There is an edge to make a wound, and an edge to open a festered wound in order to its healing. There is no escaping the edge of this sword; if ye turn aside to the right hand, it has an edge on that side; if on the left hand, you fall upon the edge of the sword on that side; it turns every way.

Secondly. From the inscription we proceed to the contents of this epistle in which the method is much the same that is observed in the rest. Here,

1. Christ takes notice of the trials and difficulties this church encountered with; ver. 13, "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest," &c. The works of God's servants are best known when their circumstances under which they did those works are duly considered. Now that circumstance which added very much lustre to the good works of this church was the circumstance of the place where this church was planted, a place where Satan's seat was. As our great Lord takes notice of all the advantages and opportunities we have for duty by the places where we dwell, so he takes notice of all the temptations and discouragements we meet with from the places where we dwell, and makes gracious allowances for them. This people dwelt where Satan's seat was, where he kept his court; his circuit is throughout the world, his seat is in some places that are infamous for wickedness, error, and cruelty. Some think the Roman governor in this city was a most violent enemy to the Christians, and the seat of persecution is Satan's seat.

2. He commends their steadfastness; ver. 13, "Thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith." These two expressions are much of the same sense; it may be the former may signify the effect, and the latter the cause or means. 1st. "Thou holdest fast my name;" thou art not ashamed of thy relation to me, but accountest it thine honour that my name is named on thee; that, as the wife bears the name of the husband, so thou art called by my name. This thou holdest fast as thine honour and privilege. 2nd. That which has made thee thus faithful is the grace of faith. Thou hast not denied the great doctrines of the Gospel, nor departed from the Christian faith, and by that means thou hast been kept faithful; and indeed our faith will have a great influence upon our faithfulness. Men that deny the faith of Christ may boast very much of their sincerity and faithfulness to God and conscience; but it has been seldom known that those who let go the true faith retain their fidelity; usually on that rock on which men make shipwreck of their faith they make shipwreck of a good conscience too. And here our blessed Lord aggrandises the fidelity of this church, from the circumstance of the times as well as of the place where they lived. They had been steadfast even in those days wherein Antipas, his faithful martyr, was slain among them. Who this person was, and whether there be any thing mysterious in his name, we have no certain account. He was a faithful disciple of Christ; he suffered martyrdom for it, and sealed his faith and fidelity with his blood, in the place where Satan dwelt; and though the rest of the believers there knew this and saw it, yet they were not discouraged nor drawn away from their steadfastness; this is mentioned as an addition to their honour.

3. He reproves them for their sinful failures; ver. 14, "But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam," &c., and "them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes, which things I hate." There were some that taught it was lawful to eat things sacrificed to idols, and that simple fornication was no sin. They by an impure worship drew men into impure practices, as Balaam did the Israelites. Observe. 1st. The filthiness of the spirit and the filthiness of the flesh often go together; corrupt doctrines and a corrupt worship often lead to a corrupt conversation. 2nd. That it is very lawful to fix the names of the leaders of any heresy upon those that follow them; it is the shortest way of telling who we mean. 3rd. That to continue in communion with persons of corrupt principles and practices, or displeasing to God, draws a guilt and blemish upon the whole society; they become partakers of other men's sins: though the church, as such, has no power to punish the persons of men, either for heresy or immorality with corporal penalties, yet they have power to exclude them from their holy communion; and if they do not so, Christ the Head and Lawgiver of the church will be displeased with them.

4. He calls them to repentance; ver. 16, "Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly," &c. Observe here, 1st. Repentance is the duty of saints as well as sinners; it is a gospel duty. 2nd. It is the duty of churches and communities as well as particular persons; they that sin together should repent together. 3rd. It is the duty of Christian societies to repent of other men's sins, as far as they have been accessory to them, though but so much as by connivance. 4th. When God comes to punish the corrupt members of a church, he rebukes that church itself for allowing such to continue in its communion, and some drops of the storm fall upon the whole society. 5th. That no sword cuts so deep, nor inflicts so mortal a wound, as the sword of Christ's mouth. Let but the threatenings of the word be set home upon the conscience of a sinner, and he will soon be a terror to himself; and let these threatenings be executed, and the sinner is utterly cut off. The word of God will take hold of sinners sooner or later, either for their conviction or confusion.

Thirdly. We have the conclusion of this epistle, where, after the usual demand of universal attention, there is the promise of great favour to those that overcome; "They shall eat of the hidden manna, and have the new name and the white stone, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it," ver. 17.

1. The hidden manna, the influences and comforts of the Spirit of Christ in communion with him, coming down from heaven into the soul from time to time for his support, to let him taste something how saints and angels live in heaven; this is hidden from the rest of the world. A stranger intermeddles not with this joy, and it is laid up in Christ, the ark of the covenant, in the holy of holies.

2. The white stone with a new name engraven upon it. This white stone is absolution from the guilt of sin, alluding to the ancient custom of giving a white stone to those acquitted on trial, and a black stone to those condemned. The new name is the name of adoption; adopted persons took the name of the family into which they were adopted. None can read the evidences of a man's adoption but himself; he cannot always read it; but if he persevere he shall have both the evidence of sonship and the inheritance.

18 And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira write; These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brass; 19 I know thy works, and charity, without meaning. "Tree of life:" the promise corresponds with the character of the fidelity displayed: "Those who have abstained from idol meats, from the sinful dainties of the flesh and world, shall in return 'eat of the tree of life.'"

ii. 8. "Smyrna:" the next city in natural order to Ephesus. It was situated a little to the north of Ephesus, and was one of the fairest and most favourably-placed cities of Ionia. Its name has become familiar in ecclesiastical history through the heroism and sufferings of Polycarp, who was probably the angel to whom this epistle was addressed.

ii. 12. "Pergamos:" "Famous for its immense library, the splendid temples of Zeus, Athené, and Apollo, but chiefly for the worship of Æsculapius, the remains of whose magnificent temple outside the city still remain" (French).

ii. 14, 15. "The doctrine of Balaam . . . Nicolaitanes:" Trench identifies those who hold the doctrine of Balaam with those that held and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works; and the last to be more than the first. 20 Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. 21 And I gave her space to repent of her fornication; and she repented not. 22 Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds. 23 And I will kill her children with death; and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works. 24 But unto you I say, and unto the rest in Thyatira, as many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak; I will put upon you none other burden. 25 But that which ye have already hold fast till I come. 26 And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: 27 And he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I received of my Father. 28 And I will give him the morning star. 29 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

THYATIRA.—ver. 18

The form of each epistle is very much the same, and in this, as the rest, we have to consider the inscription, contents, and conclusion.

First. The inscription, telling us, 1. To whom it is directed. "To the angel of the church of Thyatira," a city of the proconsular Asia, bordering upon Mysia on the north and Lydia on the south, a town of trade, from whence came the woman named Lydia, a seller of purple, who being at Philippi, in Macedonia, probably about the business of her calling, heard Paul preach there, and God opened her heart that she attended to things that were spoken, and believed, and was baptized, and entertained Paul and Silas there. Whether it was by her means that the Gospel was brought into her own city, Thyatira, is not certain, but that it was there, and successful to the forming of a gospel church, this epistle assures us. (It is remarkable, in connexion with the passage in Acts, referred to in the exposition, that among the ruins of Thyatira there is an inscription extant which was originally made by the corporation of dyers, in honour of Antonius Claudius Alphareus, in the reign of Caracalla. Even at the present time the best scarlet dye in all Asia is produced and sent to Smyrna and other places for sale. Ak-hissar, the modern Thyatira, is situated on a plain, and is embosomed in cypresses and poplars. The buildings are in general mean; but the khan, in which we are at present residing, is by far the best which I have yet seen. The Greeks are said to occupy three hundred houses and the Armenians thirty. Each of them have a church, though they do not retain the living faith of the primitive Christians.)

2. By whom it was sent. By the Son of God, who is here described as having eyes like a flame of fire, and feet like as fine brass. His general title is here the Son of God; that is, the eternal and only begotten Son of God, which denotes that he has the same nature with the Father, but with a distinct and subordinate manner of subsistence. The description we have here of him is in two characters:—1st. That his eyes are like unto a flame of fire, signifying his piercing, penetrating, perfect knowledge, a thorough insight into all persons and all things—one who searches the hearts and tries the reins of the children of men, ver. 23, and will make all the churches to know he does so. 2nd. That his feet are like fine brass, that the outgoings of his providence are steady, awful, and all pure and holy. As he judges with perfect wisdom, so he acts with perfect strength and steadiness.

Secondly. The contents or subject-matter of this epistle, which, as the rest, includes,

1. The honourable character and commendation Christ gives of this church, ministry, and people; and this given by one who was no stranger to them, but well acquainted with them, and with the principles from which they acted. Now in this church Christ makes honourable mention, 1st. Of their charity. Either more general, a disposition to do good to all men; or more special, to the household of faith. There is no religion where there is no charity. 2nd. Their service, their ministrations. This respects chiefly the officers of the church who had laboured in the word and doctrine. 3rd. Their faith, which was the grace that actuated all the rest, both their charity and their service. 4th. Their patience; for those that are most charitable to others, most diligent in their places, and most faithful, must yet expect to meet with that which will exercise their patience. 5th. Their growing fruitfulness. Their last works were better than the first. This is an excellent character; when others had left their first love, and lost their first zeal, these were growing wiser and better. It should be the ambition and earnest desire of all Christians that their last works may be their best works, that they may be better and better every day, and best at last.

2. A faithful reproof for what was amiss. And this is not so directly charged upon the church itself as upon some wicked seducers that were among them. The church's fault was that she connived too much at them.

1st. These wicked seducers are compared to Jezebel, and called by her name. Jezebel was a persecutor of the prophets of the Lord, and a great patroness of idolaters and false prophets. The sin of these seducers, which was then attempted to draw the servants of God into fornication, was to offer sacrifices to idols. They called themselves prophets, and so would claim a superior authority and regard to the ministers of that church. Two things aggravated the sin of these seducers, who, being one in their spirit and design, are spoken of as one person. First. They made use of the name of God to oppose the truth of his doctrine and worship; this very much aggravated their sin. Secondly. They abused the patience of God to harden themselves in their wickedness. God gave them space for repentance, but they repented not. Observe, 1st. Repentance is necessary, to prevent the sinner's ruin. 2nd. Repentance requires time, a course of time, and time convenient; it is a great work, and a work of time. 3rd. Where God gives space for repentance, he expects fruits meet for repentance. 4th. Where the space for repentance is lost the sinner perishes with a double destruction.

2nd. Now why should the wickedness of this Jezebel be charged upon the church of Thyatira? Why, because that church suffered her to seduce the people of that city. But how could they help it? They had not, as a church, civil power to banish or imprison her; but they had ministerial power to censure and to excommunicate her; and it is probable that neglecting to use the power they had made them sharers in her sin.

3. The punishment of this seducer, this Jezebel ver. 22, 23, in which is couched a prediction of the fall of Babylon. 1st. "I will cast her into a bed," into a bed of pain, not of pleasure, into a bed of flames; and they that have sinned with her shall suffer with her, but this may yet be prevented by their repentance. 2nd. "I will kill her children with death;" that is, the second death, which does the work effectually, and leaves no hope of future life; no resurrection for those that are killed by the second death, but only to shame and everlasting contempt.

4. The design of Christ in the destruction of these wicked seducers, and that was the instruction of others, especially of his churches: "All the churches shall know that I am he that searcheth the reins and the hearts; and I will give to every one of you according to your works." God is known by the judgments that he executeth; and by this revenge taken upon seducers he would make known, 1st. His infallible knowledge of the hearts of men, of their principles, designs, frame, and temper, their formality, their indifference, their secret inclinations to symbolise with idolaters. 2nd. His impartial justice, in giving every one according to his work, that the name of Christians should be no protection, their churches should be no sanctuaries for sin and sinners.

5. The encouragement given to those that kept themselves pure and undefiled; ver. 24, "But to you I say, and to the rest," &c. Observe, 1st. What these seducers called their doctrines: depths, profound mysteries, amusing the people, and endeavouring to persuade them that they had a deeper insight into religion than their own ministers had attained to. 2nd. What Christ called them: depths of Satan, satanical delusions and devices, diabolical mysteries; for there is a mystery of iniquity as well as the great mystery of godliness. It is a dangerous thing to despise the mystery of God, and it is as dangerous to receive the mysteries of Satan. 3rd. How tender Christ is of his faithful servants; ver. 25, "I will lay upon you no other burden; but that which you have already, hold fast till I come." I will not overburden your faith with any new mysteries, nor your consciences with any new laws. I only require your attention to what you have received; "Hold that fast till I come," and I desire no more. Christ is coming to put an end to all the temptations of his people; and if they hold fast faith and a good conscience till he comes, all the difficulty and danger is over.

Thirdly. We now come to the conclusion of this message, ver. 26—29; where you have,

1. The promise of an ample reward to the persevering, victorious believer, in two parts: 1st. Very great power and dominion over the rest of the world. Power over the nations, which may refer either to the time when the empire should turn Christian, and the world be under the government of the Christian emperor, as in Constantine's time; or to the other world, when believers shall sit down with Christ on his throne of judgment, and join with him in trying, and condemning, and consigning over to punishment the enemies of Christ and the church. The upright shall have dominion in the morning. 2nd. Knowledge and wisdom, suitable to such power and dominion. I will give him the morning star. Christ is the morning star; he brings day with him into the soul, the light of grace and of glory; and he will give his people that perfection of light and wisdom that is requisite to that state of dignity and dominion that they shall have in the morning of the resurrection.

2. This epistle ends with the usual demand of attention; "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." In the foregoing epistles this demand of attention comes before the concluding promise; but in this and all that follow it comes after, and tells us that we should all attend to the promises as well as to the precepts that Christ delivers to the churches.

CHAPTER III.

Here we have three more of the epistles of Christ to the churches. I. To Sardis, ver. 1—4. II. To Philadelphia, ver. 7—13. III. To Laodicea, ver. 14 to the end.

the doctrine of the Nicolaitanes. The name Nicolas is but a Grecising of Balaam, both signifying "destroyer of the people." The Nicolaitanes, then, or Balaamites, are no sect that in apostolic times bore one of these names or the other, but those who, after the pattern of Balaam's sin, sought to introduce a false freedom—a freedom of the flesh—into the Church of God.

ii. 18. "Thyatira:" a city of no first-rate dignity, and a Macedonian colony. (Compare Acts xvi. 14.)

ii. 20. "That woman Jezebel:" Alford renders, "thy wife Jezebel." "A comparison of this verse with verses 14—16 leaves no doubt," says Trench, "that the Jezebelites, and Balaamites, and Nicolaitanes, with secondary differences no doubt, were yet substantially the same."

iii. 1. "Sardis:" now Sart, situated on the river Pactolus. "A name to live:" some earlier commentators conjectured that this expression contained an allusion to the name of the angel of the which remain, that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God. 3 Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee. 4 Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy. 5 He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels. 6 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

Here, First. The preface, shewing, 1. To whom this letter is directed, "To the angel of the church of Sardis," an ancient city of Lydia, on the banks of the mountain Tmolus, said to have been the chief city of Asia the Less, and the first city in that part of the world that was converted by the preaching of St. John; and some say the first that revolted from Christianity, and one of the first that was laid in its ruins, in which it still lies, without any church or ministry.

[This morning I have visited Sardis, once the splendid capital of Lydia, the famous residence of Croesus, the resort of Persian monarchs, and one of the most ancient and magnificent cities of the world. Now, how fallen! The ruins are, with one exception, more entirely gone to decay than those of most of the ancient cities which we have visited. No Christians reside on the spot; two Greeks only work in a mill here, and a few wretched Turkish huts are scattered among the ruins. We saw the churches of St. John and the Virgin, the theatre, and the building styled the palace of Croesus; but the most striking object at Sardis is the temple of Cybele. I was filled with wonder and awe at beholding the two stupendous columns of this edifice, which are still remaining; they are silent but impressive witnesses of the power and splendour of antiquity. I read, amidst the ruins, the epistle, Rev. iii. 1-6, addressed to the church once fixed here. What an impressive warning to Christian churches! A name to live, while dead!]

2. By whom this message was sent. The Lord Jesus, who here assumes the character of him that hath the seven Spirits of God, and the seven stars, taken out of ch. i. 4, where the seven Spirits are said to be before the throne. 1st. He hath the seven Spirits, that is, the Holy Spirit, with his various powers, graces, and operations; for he is personally one, though efficaciously various, and may be said here to be seven, which is the number of the churches, and of the angels of the churches—to shew that to every minister and to every church there is a dispensation and measure of the Spirit given for them to profit withal,—a stock of spiritual influence for that minister and church to improve both for enlargement and continuance, which measure of the Spirit is not ordinarily withdrawn from them till they forfeit it by misimprovement. Churches have their spiritual stock and fund, as well as particular believers; and this epistle, being sent unto a languishing ministry and church, therefore they are very fitly put in mind that Christ has the seven Spirits, the Spirit without measure, and in perfection, to whom they may apply themselves for the reviving of his work among them. 2nd. He hath the seven stars, the angels of the churches. They are disposed of by him, and accountable to him, which should make them faithful and zealous. He hath ministers to employ, and spiritual influences to communicate to his ministers for the good of his church: the Holy Spirit usually works by the ministry, and the ministry will be of no efficacy without the Spirit; and the same Divine hand holds them both.

Secondly. The body of this epistle; and there is this observable in it, that, whereas in the other epistles Christ begins with commending what was good in the churches, and then proceeds to tell them what was amiss,—in this, and in the epistle to Laodicea, he begins,

1. With a reproof, and a very severe one: "I know thy works, that thou hast a name, that thou livest, and art dead." Hypocrisy, and a lamentable decay in religion, are the sins charged upon this church by one that knew her well, and all her works. 1st. This church had gained a great reputation; it had a name, and a very honourable one, for a flourishing church,—a name for vital, lively religion, for purity of doctrine, unity among themselves, uniformity in worship, decency, and order. We read not of any unhappy divisions among themselves; every thing appeared well as to what falls under the observation of men. 2nd. This church was not really what it was reputed to be. They had a name to live, but they were dead; there was a form of godliness but not the power; a name to live, but not a principle of life. If there was not a total privation of life, yet there was a great deadness in their souls, and in their services; a great deadness in the spirits of their ministers, and a great deadness in their ministrations, in their praying, in their preaching, in their converse; and a great deadness in the people in hearing, in prayer, and in conversation. What little life was yet left among them was in a manner expiring, ready to die.

2. Our Lord proceeds to give this degenerate church the best advice; "Be watchful, and strengthen the things," &c., ver. 2. 1st. He advises them to be upon their watch; the cause of their sinful deadness and declension was, that they had let down their watch. Whenever we are off our watch we lose ground, and therefore must return to our watchfulness against sin, and Satan, and whatever is destructive to the life and power of godliness. 2nd. To strengthen the things that remain, and that are ready to die. Some understand this of persons; there were some few that had retained their integrity, but they were in danger of declining with the rest. It is a difficult thing to keep up to the life and power of godliness ourselves, when we see a universal deadness and declension prevailing round about us; or it may be understood of practices, as it follows, "I have not found thy works perfect before God," not filled up; there is something wanting in them; there is the shell, but not the kernel; there is the carcass, but not the soul—the shadow, but not the substance. The inward thing is wanting; thy works are hollow and empty. Prayers are not filled up with holy desires, alms-deeds are not filled up with true charity, sabbaths not filled up with suitable devotion of soul to God; there are not inward affections suitable to outward acts and expressions. Now when the spirit is wanting the form cannot long subsist. 3rd. To recollect themselves, and remember how they had received and heard, ver. 3. Not only to remember what they had received and heard, what messages they had received from God, what tokens of his mercy and favour towards them, what sermons they had heard—but how they had received and heard, what impressions the mercies of God had made upon their souls at first, what affections they felt working under the word and ordinances; the love of their espousals, the kindness of their youth; how welcome the Gospel and the grace of God were to them when they first received them;—where is the blessedness they then spoke of? 4th. To hold fast what they had received, that they might not lose all, and repent sincerely that they had lost so much of the life of religion, and had run the risk of losing all.

3. Christ enforces his counsel with a dreadful threatening in case it should be despised; ver. 3, "I will come unto thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know the hour." Observe, 1st. When Christ leaves a people as to his gracious presence, he comes to them in judgment, and his judicial presence will be very dreadful to those that have sinned away his gracious presence. 2nd. His judicial approach to a dead, declining people will be surprising. Their deadness will keep them in security; and as it procures an angry visit from Christ to them, it will prevent their discerning it, and preparing for it. 3rd. Such a visit from Christ will be to their loss; he will come as a thief to strip them of their remaining enjoyments and mercies,—not by fraud, but in justice and righteousness, taking the forfeiture they have made of all to him.

4. Our blessed Lord does not leave this sinful people without some comfort and encouragement; in the midst of judgment he remembers mercy, ver. 4. And here, 1st. He makes honourable mention of the faithful remnant in Sardis, though but small; "Thou hast a few names in Sardis, which have not defiled their garments," had not given in to the prevailing corruptions and pollution of the day and place in which they lived. God takes notice of the smallest number of those who abide with him, and the fewer they are the more precious in his sight. 2nd. He makes a very gracious promise to them, "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy;" in the stola, the white robes of justification, and adoption, and comfort, or in the white robes of honour and glory in the other world. They shall walk with Christ in the pleasant walks of the heavenly paradise, and what delightful converse will there be between Christ and them when they thus walk together! And this is an honour proper and suitable to their integrity, and which their fidelity has prepared them for, and which it is no way unbecoming Christ to confer upon them; though it is not a legal but a Gospel worthiness that is ascribed to them; not merit, but meekness; they that walk with Christ in the clean garments of real practical holiness here, and keep themselves unspotted from the world, shall walk with Christ in the white robes of honour and glory in the other world. This is a suitable reward.

Thirdly. We now come to the conclusion of this epistle, in which, as before, we have,

1. A great reward promised to the conquering Christian, ver. 5; and it is very much the same with what has been already mentioned; "He that overcometh shall be clothed in white raiment." The purity of grace shall be rewarded with the perfect purity of glory. Holiness, when perfected, shall be its own reward; glory is the perfection of grace, differing not in kind, but in degree. Now to this is added another promise, very suitable to the case; "I will not blot his name out of the book of life, but will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels." Observe, 1st. Christ has his book of life, a register and roll of all that shall inherit eternal life. First. The book of eternal election. Secondly. The book of remembrance of all those that have lived to God, and have kept up the life and power of godliness in evil times. 2nd. Christ will not blot the names of his chosen and faithful ones out of this book of life. Men may be enrolled in the registers of the church as baptized as making a profession, as having a name to live, and that name may come to be blotted out of the roll, when it appears it was but a name, a name to live without spiritual life. Such oftentimes lose the very name before they die; they are left of God to blot out their own names by their gross and open wickedness; but the names of those that overcome shall never be blotted out. 3rd. Christ church of Sardis, whose name may have been a compound word signifying "life-bearing" or "living," such as Zosimos. But this seems a far-fetched conjecture, especially as the Greeks used the word "name" as equivalent to fame or reputation, just as we do in English.

iii. 2 "Be watchful;" or, as Trench suggests, "become watchful." "The things which remain;" this, though the Greek expression is in the neuter, is taken by many commentators as equivalent to "those which remain"—i.e., the rest who are not yet dead, though close upon it. "We gather from these words that, with few exceptions, the entire Sardian church shared in this deadness of its chief pastor; while he, in seeking to revive their life, to chafe their dead limbs, would best revive and recover the warmth of his own. Their present abject and fallen condition is excellently expressed by the use of the neuter" (Trench). "Perfect before God;" the word rendered "perfect" here is not the same as that will produce this book of life, and confess the names of the faithful that stand there, before God and all the angels. He will do this as their Judge, when the books shall be opened; he will do this as their Captain and Head, leading them with him triumphantly to heaven, presenting them to the Father; "Behold me, and the children that thou hast given me!" How great will this honour and reward be!

2. The demand of universal attention finishes the message. Every word from God deserves attention from men; that which may seem more particularly directed to one body of men has something in it instructive to all.

7 And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia write; These things saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth; 8 I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name. 9 Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee. 10 Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth. 11 Behold, I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. 12 Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and I will write upon him my new name. 13 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

PHILADELPHIA.—ver. 7.

We are now come to the sixth letter, sent to one of the Asiatic churches. Where observe,

First. The inscription. Shewing, 1. For whom it was more immediately designed; "The angel of the church of Philadelphia." This also was a city in the lesser Asia, seated upon the borders of Mysia and Lydia, and had its name from that brotherly love for which it was eminent.

[The town is situated on a rising ground, beneath the snowy mount Tmolus. The houses are embosomed in trees, which have just assumed their fresh green foliage, and give a beautiful effect to the scene. I counted six minarets. We entered through a ruined wall—massy, but by no means of great antiquity. The streets are excessively ill paved and dirty. It is an interesting circumstance to find Christianity more flourishing here than in many other parts of the Turkish empire. There is still a numerous Christian population, occupying three hundred houses. Divine service is performed every Sunday, in five churches; and there are twenty of a smaller description, in which, once a year, the Liturgy is read. But though the candlestick remains, its light is obscured: the lamp still exists, but where is its oil? Where is now the word of our Lord's patience?—It is conveyed in sounds unintelligible to those who hear. When the very epistle to their own church is read, they understand it not! The word of legendary superstition and of multifarious will-worship is now familiar to their ears. And where is the bright exhibition of Christian virtues?—Unhappily, the character of Christians in these countries will scarcely bear comparison with that of Mahometans themselves! In a word, Philadelphia has had her share in that utter apostasy from true and practical Christianity which has been the bane of the East.]

which is commonly translated "perfect"—e.g., in Phil. iii. 15, or in Heb. v. 14 (where we have it translated "full age")—but it is a word which rather refers to the fulfilling of the works and duties appointed by God; these the angel of Sardis had not fulfilled.

iii. 7. "Philadelphia," situated on the banks of the river Cogamus, was built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, from whom it derived its name. No city in Asia Minor suffered so much from earthquakes. Strabo alludes to these, and says it was almost

We can hardly suppose that this name was given to it after it received the Christian religion, and that it was so called from that Christian affection that all believers have, and should have, one for another, as the children of one Father, and the brethren of Christ; but rather that it was its ancient name, on the account of that love and kindness which the citizens had, and shewed to each other as a civil fraternity, which was an excellent spirit; and when sanctified by the grace of the Gospel would render them an excellent church, as indeed they were; for here is no one fault found with this church, and yet doubtless there were faults in it of common infirmity; but love covers such faults.

2. By whom this letter was signed, even by the same Jesus, who is alone the universal Head of all the churches. And here observe by what title he chooses to represent himself to this church, namely, "He that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David," &c. You have his personal character; "He that is true," and "he that is true," holy in his nature, and therefore cannot but be true to his word, for he hath spoken in his holiness. And you have also his political character; "He hath the key of David, he openeth, and no man shutteth," &c.; the key of the house of David, the key of government and authority in and over the church. Where, 1st. Observe the acts of his government. First. He opens. He opens a door of opportunity to his churches; he opens a door of utterance to his ministers; he opens a door of entrance, opens the heart; he opens a door of admission into the visible church, laying down the terms of communion, and he opens the door of admission into the church triumphant, according to the terms of salvation fixed by him. Secondly. He shuts the door. When he pleases he shuts the door of opportunity and the door of utterance, and leaves obstinate sinners shut up in the hardness of their hearts; and shuts the door of church fellowship against unbelievers and profane persons; and he shuts the door of heaven against the foolish virgins that have slept away their day of grace, and against the workers of iniquity, how vain and confident soever they may be. 2nd. The way and manner in which he performs these acts, and that is absolute sovereignty, independent upon the will of men, and irresistible by the power of men; "He openeth, and no man shutteth, he shutteth, and no man openeth;" he works to will and to do, and when he works none can let. These were proper characters for him, when speaking to a church that had endeavoured to be conformed to Christ in holiness and truth, and that had enjoyed a wide door of liberty and opportunity under his care and government.

Secondly. The subject-matter of this epistle. Where, 1. Christ puts them in mind of what he had done for them; ver. 8, "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." I have set it open, and kept it open, though there be many adversaries. Learn here, 1st. Christ is to be acknowledged as the author of all the liberty and opportunity his churches enjoy. 2nd. He takes notice, and keeps account, how long he has preserved their spiritual liberties and privileges for them. 3rd. That wicked men envy the people of God their door of liberty, and would be glad to shut it against them. 4th. That if we do not provoke Christ to shut this door against us, men cannot do it.

2. This church is commended; ver. 8, "Thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name." In this there seems to be couched a gentle reproof; "Thou hast a little strength," a little grace, which, though it be not proportionate to the wide door of opportunity which I have opened to thee, yet is true grace, and has kept thee faithful. True grace, though weak, has the Divine approbation; but though Christ accepts a little strength, yet believers should not rest satisfied in a little, but should strive to grow in grace, to be strong in faith, giving glory to God. True grace, though weak, will do more than the greatest gifts, or highest degrees of common grace, for it will enable the Christian to keep the word of Christ, and not to deny his name. Obedience, fidelity, and a free confession of the name of Christ, are the fruits of true grace, and are pleasing to Christ as such.

3. Here is a promise of the great favours God would bestow on this church, ver. 9, 10. This favour consists in two things. 1st. Christ would make this church's enemies subject to her. First. Those enemies are described to be such as said they were Jews, but lied in saying so; pretended to be the only and peculiar people of God, but were really the synagogue of Satan. Assemblies that worship God in spirit and in truth are the Israel of God, assemblies that either worship false gods or the true God in a false manner are the synagogues of Satan, though they may profess to be the only people of God—their profession is a lie. Secondly. Their subjection to the church is described. They shall worship at thy feet, not pay a religious and Divine honour to the church itself, or to the ministry of it, but shall be convinced that they have been in the wrong; that this church is in the right, and is beloved by Christ; and they shall desire to be taken into communion with her, and that they may worship the same God, after the same manner. And how shall this great change be wrought? By the power of God upon the hearts of his enemies, and by signal discoveries of his peculiar favour to his church. They shall know that I have loved thee. Observe, 1st. The greatest honour and happiness any church can enjoy is the peculiar love and favour of Christ. 2nd. Christ can discover this his favour to his people in such a manner as that their very enemies shall see it, and be forced to acknowledge it. 3rd. That this will, by the grace of Christ, soften the hearts of their enemies, and make them desirous to be admitted into communion with them. 2nd. Another instance of favour that Christ promises to this church is persevering grace in the most trying times, ver. 10, and this as the reward of their past fidelity; "To him that hath shall be given." Here observe, First. The Gospel of Christ is the word of his patience; it is the fruit of the patience of God to a sinful world; it sets before men the exemplary patience of Christ in all his sufferings for men; it calls those that receive it to the exercise of patience in conformity to Christ. Secondly. This Gospel should be carefully kept by all that enjoy it; they must keep up to the faith, and practice, and worship prescribed in the Gospel. Thirdly. After a day of patience we must expect an hour of temptation; a day of gospel peace and liberty is a day of God's patience, and it is seldom so well improved as it should be, and therefore often followed by an hour of trial and temptation. Fourthly. Sometimes the trial is more general and universal; it comes upon all the world, and when it is so general it is usually the shorter. Fifthly. They that keep the Gospel in a time of peace shall be kept by Christ in an hour of temptation. By keeping the Gospel they are prepared for the trial, and the same Divine grace that has made them fruitful in times of peace will make them faithful in times of persecution.

4. Christ calls the church to that duty which he before promised he would enable her to do, and that is to persevere, to hold fast that which she had. 1st. The duty itself. Hold fast that which thou hast; that faith, that truth, that strength of grace, that zeal, that love to the brethren; thou hast been possessed of this excellent treasure, hold it fast. 2nd. The motives taken from the speedy appearance of Christ; "Behold, I come quickly." See I am just a coming to relieve them under the trial, and to reward their fidelity, and to punish those that fall away. They shall lose that crown that they once seemed to have a right to, and that they hoped for, and pleased themselves with the thoughts of. The persevering Christian shall win the prize from backsliding professors that once stood fair for it.

depopulated in consequence. In the great earthquake in the reign of Tiberius it was nearly destroyed. "He that is holy, he that is true;" two out of three of the oldest MSS. change the order. Alford renders "the true one, the holy one." "Key of David," &c.: the allusion to the prophecy concerning Eliakim (Isa. xxii. 15–23; see especially verse 22) is too obvious to be overlooked.

iii. 14. "Laodicea:" midway between Philadelphia and Colosse. Its earliest name was Dospolis, then Rhoads. It was rebuilt and Thirdly. The conclusion of this epistle, ver. 12, 1., where, 1. After his usual manner our Saviour promises a glorious reward to the victorious believer in two things. 1st. He shall be a monumental pillar in the temple of God; not a pillar to support the temple; heaven needs no such props, but a monument of the free and powerful grace of God, a monument that shall never be defaced or removed, as many stately pillars erected in honour to the Roman emperors and generals are. 2nd. On this monumental pillar there shall be an honourable inscription, as in those cases is usual. First. The name of God, in whose cause he engaged, whom he served, and for whom he suffered in this warfare, and the name of the city of God, the church of God, the new Jerusalem, which came down from heaven. On this pillar shall be recorded all the services the believer did to the church of God, how he asserted her rights, enlarged her borders, maintained her purity and honour; this will be a greater name than Asiaticus or Africanus, a soldier under God, in the wars of the church. And then another part of the inscription is, Secondly. The new name of Christ, the Mediator, the Redeemer, the Captain of our salvation; by this it will appear under whose banner this conquering believer was listed, under whose conduct he acted, by whose example he was encouraged, and under whose influence he fought the good fight, and came off victorious.

2. The epistle is closed up with the demand of attention; "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches," how Christ loves and values his faithful people, how he commends, and how he will crown their fidelity.

14 And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans write; These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God; 15 I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot. 16 So then because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth. 17 Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: 18 I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see. 19 As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore, and repent. 20 Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me. 21 To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne. 22 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

LAODICEA.—ver. 14.

We are now come to the last and worst of all the seven Asiatic churches, the reverse of the church of Philadelphia; for, as there was nothing reprov'd in that, here is nothing commended in this; and yet this was one of the seven golden candlesticks; for a corrupt church may be still a church here, as before.

First. The inscription, to whom and from whom.

1. To whom: to the angel of the church of Laodicea. This was a once famous city near the river Lycus, had a wall of vast compass, and three marble theatres, and, like Rome, was built on seven hills. It seems the apostle Paul was very instrumental in planting the Gospel in this city, and from hence he wrote a letter, which he mentions in the epistle to the Colossians, the last chapter, and sends salutations to them, as being not above twenty miles distant from Colosse. In this city was held a council in the fourth century, but adorned by Antiochus II., king of Syria, who called it Laodicea, after his wife Laodice, by whom he was afterwards poisoned. Its commerce was considerable, its trade consisting chiefly of wools grown in the neighbourhood, which were valued for their colour and texture. During the Mithridatic war it suffered much, and in the great earthquake it was much injured. "Angel:" it has been conjectured by some that this was the Archippus to whom St. Paul sent the admonition in Col. iv. 17. The conjecture receives it has been long since demolished, and lies in its ruins to this day—an awful monument of the wrath of the Lamb.

[The first object which attracts attention at Laodicea is the great number of sarcophagi. In these, I reflected, the material part of many Laodicean Christians has returned, "earth to earth—ashes to ashes—dust to dust;" their spirits have long since given account of the manner in which they availed themselves of the faithful admonitions of the Apocalypse. The city of Laodicea was seated on a hill of moderate height, but of considerable extent. Its ruins attest that it was large, populous, and splendid. There are still to be seen an amphitheatre, a theatre, an aqueduct, and many other buildings. But its present condition is in striking conformity with the rebuke and threatening of God. Not a single Christian resides at Laodicea! No Turk even has a fixed residence on this forsaken spot. Infidelity itself must confess that the menace of the Scriptures has been executed. It now stands neglected of God and deserted of men; its glory a ruin, its name a reproach. (See Researches in Greece, by Rev. John Hartley, whence this account of the seven Apocalyptic churches (which he visited in 1826) has been principally taken.) Besides these seven churches we find in Scripture mention made of Hierapolis, now Pambock Kaladi, without a single Christian inhabitant; and Colosse, now Konas, where a band of about thirty Greek Christians are found. In Antioch of Pisidia, now Isbarta, are several Greek churches. Iconium is well known under the name of Konieh, and is a flourishing city; but Derbe, the birthplace of Gaius and Timothy, and Lystra, where Paul was stoned, have not yet been described by any traveller.]

2. From whom this message was sent. Here our Lord Jesus styles himself "the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God." 1st. "The Amen," one that is steady and unchangeable in all his purposes and promises, which are all yea, and all amen. 2nd. "The faithful and true witness," whose testimony of God to men ought to be received and fully believed, and whose testimony of men to God will be fully believed and regarded, and will be a swift but true witness against all indifferent, lukewarm professors. 3rd. "The beginning of the creation of God," either of the first creation, and so he is the beginning, that is, the First Cause, the Creator, and the Governor of it; or of the second creation, the church; and so he is the Head of that body, the first-born from the dead, as it is in ch. i. 5, from whence these titles are taken. Christ having raised up himself by his own Divine power, as the Head of a new world, raises up dead souls to be a living temple and church to himself.

Secondly. The subject-matter; in which observe, 1. The heavy charge drawn up against this church, ministers, and people, by one that knew them better than they knew themselves; ver. 15, "Thou art neither cold nor hot," but worse than either; "I would thou wert cold or hot." Lukewarmness, or indifference in religion, is the worst temper in the world. If religion be a real thing, it is the most excellent thing, and therefore we should be in good earnest in it; if it be not a real thing, it is the vilest imposture, and we should be earnest against it. If religion be worth any thing it is worth every thing—an indifference here is inexcusable; "Why halt ye between two opinions? If God be God, follow him; if Baal be God, follow him." Here is no room for neutrality. An open enemy shall have fairer quarter than a perfidious neuter, and there is more hope of a heathen than of such. Christ expects that men should declare themselves in earnest either for him or against him.

2. A severe punishment threatened; "I will spue thee out of my mouth." As lukewarm water turns the stomach, and provokes to a vomit, lukewarm professors turn the heart of Christ against them; he is sick of them, and cannot long bear them; they may call their lukewarmness charity, meekness, moderation, and a largeness of soul; it is nauseous to Christ, and makes those so that allow themselves in it. They shall be rejected, and finally rejected; for far be it from the holy Jesus to return to that which has been thus rejected.

3. We have one cause of this indifference and inconsistency in religion assigned, and that is self-conceit and self-delusion; they thought they were very well already, and therefore they were very indifferent whether they grew better or no; "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods," &c., ver. 17. Here observe what a difference there was between the thoughts they had of themselves and the thoughts that Christ had of them. 1st. The high thoughts they had of themselves; "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing;" rich, and growing richer, and increased to that degree as to be above all want, or possibility of wanting. Perhaps they were well provided for as to their bodies, and that made them overlook the necessities of their souls; or they thought themselves well furnished in their souls; they had learning, and they took it for religion; they had gifts, and they took them for grace; they had wit, and they took it for true wisdom; they had ordinances, and they took up with them instead of the God of ordinances. How careful should we be not to put the cheat upon our own souls? Doubtless there are many in hell that once thought themselves to be in the way to heaven. Let us daily beg of God that we may not be left to flatter and deceive ourselves in the concerns of our souls. 2nd. The mean thoughts that Christ had of them; and he was not mistaken. He knew, though they knew not, that they were wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked; their state was wretched in itself, and such as called for pity and compassion from others; though they were proud of themselves, they were pitied by all that knew their case. For, First. They were poor, really poor, when they said and thought they were rich; they had no provision for their souls to live upon; their souls were starving in the midst of their abundance; they were vastly in debt to the justice of God, and had nothing to pay off the least part of the debt. Secondly. They were blind; they could not see their state, nor their way, nor their danger; they could not see into themselves; they could not look before them; they were blind, and yet they thought they saw; the very light that was in them was darkness, and then how great must that darkness be! They could not see Christ, though evidently set forth, and crucified, before their eyes; they could not see God by faith, though always present in them; they could not see death, though it was just before them; they could not look into eternity, though they stood upon the very brink of it continually. Thirdly. They were naked, without clothing, and without house and harbour for their souls; they were without clothing, had neither the garment of justification nor of sanctification; their nakedness, both of guilt and pollution, had no covering; they lay always exposed to sin and shame; their righteousnesses were but filthy rags; they were rags, and would not cover them—filthy rags, and would defile them; and they were naked, without house or harbour, for they were without God, and he has been the dwelling-place of his people in all ages; in him alone the soul of man can find rest and safety, and all suitable accommodations. The riches of the body will not enrich the soul; the sight of the body will not enlighten the soul; the most convenient house for the body will not afford rest or safety to the soul; the soul is a different thing from the body, and must have accommodation suitable to its nature, or else in the midst of bodily prosperity it will be wretched and miserable.

4. We have good counsel given by Christ to this naughty people, and that is, that they drop their vain and false opinion they had of themselves, and endeavour to that really which they would seem to be; "I counsel thee to buy of support from the fact that Archippus is named in the apostolical constitutions as the first bishop of Laodicea.

iii. 17. "Knowest not that?" &c. Both Alford and Trench adopt a more forcible rendering: "knowest not that thou art the wretched one and the miserable one ('the pitiable one,' so Alford), and poor and blind," &c.

iv. 1. "A door was opened," &c.: Alford renders, "Behold a door set open in heaven, and the former voice which I heard," &c. "It me," &c., ver. 18. Observe, 1st. That our Lord Jesus continues to give good counsel to those that have cast his counsels behind their backs. 2nd. The condition of sinners is never desperate while they enjoy the gracious calls and counsels of Christ. 3rd. That our blessed Lord, the Counsellor, always gives the best advice, and that which is most suitable to the sinner's case; as here, First. These people were poor. Christ counsels them to buy of him gold tried in the fire, that they might be rich; he lets them know where they might have true riches, and how they might have them—where they might have them, from himself; he sends them not to the streams of Pactolus, nor to the mines of Potosia, but invites them to himself, who is the Pearl of price. And how must they have this true gold from him? They must buy it. That seems to be unsaying all again. How can they that are poor buy gold? Why, as they may buy of Christ wine and milk, that is, without money and without price, Isa. lv. 1. Something, indeed, must be parted with, but it is nothing of a valuable consideration, it is only to make room for receiving true riches. Part with sin and self-sufficiency, and come to Christ with a sense of your poverty and emptiness, that you may be filled with his hidden treasures. Secondly. These people were naked. Christ tells them where they might have clothing, and such as would cover the shame of their nakedness. This they must receive from Christ; and they must only put off their filthy rags that they might put on the white raiment that he had purchased and provided for them—his own imputed righteousness for justification, and the garments of holiness and sanctification. Thirdly. They were blind, and he counsels them to buy of him eye-salve, that they might see; to give up their own wisdom and reason, which is but blindness in the things of God, and resign themselves to his word and Spirit; and their eyes should be opened to see their way and their end, their duty and their true interest; a new and glorious scene would then open itself to their souls; a new world, furnished with the most beautiful and excellent objects, and this light would be marvellous to them that were but just now delivered from the powers of darkness. This is the wise and good counsel Christ gives to careless souls, and, if they follow it, he will judge himself bound in honour to make it effectual.

5. Here is added great and gracious encouragement to this sinful people to take the admonition and advice well that Christ had given them, ver. 19, 20. He tells them, 1st. It was given them in true and tender affection; "Whom I love, I rebuke and chasten." You may think I have given you hard words and severe reproofs; it is all out of love to your souls. I would have them openly rebuked and corrected, your sinful lukewarmness and vain confidence; if I had not been a lover of your souls, had I hated you, I would have let you alone to go on in sin till it had been your ruin. Sinners ought to take the rebukes of God's word and rod as tokens of his goodwill to their souls, and should accordingly repent in good earnest, and turn to him that smites them: better are the frowns and wounds of a friend than the flattering smiles of an enemy. 2nd. That if they would comply with his admonitions, he was ready to make them good to their souls; "Behold, I stand at the door and knock," &c., ver. 20. Here observe, First. That Christ is graciously pleased by his word and Spirit to come to the door of the heart of sinners; he draws near to them in a way of mercy, ready to make them a kind visit. Secondly. He finds this door shut against him; the heart of man is by nature shut up against Christ by ignorance, unbelief, sinful prejudices. Thirdly. When he finds the heart shut, he does not immediately withdraw, but he waits to be gracious, even till his head be filled with the dew. Fourthly. He uses all proper means to awaken sinners, and to cause them to open to him; he calls by his word, he knocks by the impulses of his Spirit upon their consciences. Fifthly. They that open to him shall enjoy his presence to their great comfort and advantage; he will sup with them, he will accept of what is good in them, he will eat his pleasant fruit, and he will bring the best part of the entertainment with him. If what he finds would make but a poor feast, what he brings will make up the deficiency; he will give fresh supplies of graces and comforts, and thereby stir up fresh actings of faith, and love, and delight; and in all this Christ and his repenting people will enjoy pleasant communion with each other. Alas! what do careless, obstinate sinners lose by refusing to open the door of the heart to Christ!

Thirdly. We now come to the conclusion of this epistle, and here, as before, 1. The promise made to the overcoming believer. It is here implied, 1st. That though this church seemed to be wholly overrun and overcome with lukewarmness and self-confidence, yet it was possible that by the reproofs and counsels of Christ they might be inspired with fresh zeal and vigour, and might come off conquerors in their spiritual warfare. 2nd. That if they did so, all former faults should be forgiven, and they should have a great reward. And what is that reward? "They shall sit down with me on my throne, as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne," ver. 21. Here it is intimated, First. That, Christ himself had met with his temptations and conflicts. Secondly. That he overcame them all, and was more than a conqueror. Thirdly. That, as the reward of his conflict and victory, he is set down with God the Father on his throne, possessed of that glory which he had with the Father from eternity, but which he was pleased very much to conceal on earth; leaving it, as it were, in the hands of the Father, as a pledge that he would fulfil the work of a Saviour before he reassumed that manifestative glory, and having done so, then he does pignus repositum,—demands the pledge, to appear in his Divine glory equal to the Father. Fourthly. That those that are conformed to Christ in his trials and victories shall be conformed to him in his glory; they shall sit down with him on his throne, on his throne of judgment, at the end of the world, on his throne of glory to all eternity, shining in his beams by virtue of their union with him, and relation to him, as the mystical body of which he is the Head.

2. All is closed up with the general demand of attention, ver. 22, putting all to whom these epistles shall come in mind that what is contained in them is not of private interpretation, not intended only for the instruction, and reproof, and correction of those particular churches, but of all the churches of Christ, in all ages and parts of the world; and as there will be a resemblance in all succeeding churches to these, both in their graces and sins, so they may expect that God will deal with them as he dealt with these, which are patterns to all ages what faithful and fruitful churches may expect to receive from God, and what those that are unfaithful may expect to suffer from his hand; yea, that God's dealings with his churches may afford useful instruction to the rest of the world, to put them upon considering, "if judgment begin at the house of God, what shall the end of them be that do not obey the Gospel of Christ?" 1 Pet. iv. 17. And thus end the messages of Christ to the Asiatic churches, the epistolary part of this book. We now come to the prophetic part.

CHAPTER IV.

In this chapter the prophetic scene opens; and, as the epistolary part opened with a vision of Christ, ch. i., so this part is introduced with a glorious appearance of the great God, whose throne is in heaven, compassed about with the heavenly host. This discovery was made to John, and in this chapter he, 1. Records the heavenly sights he saw, ver. 1—7. And then, 2. The heavenly songs he heard, ver. 8 to the end.

AFTER this I looked, and, behold, a door was opened in heaven: and the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, Come up hither, and I will shew thee things which must be hereafter. 2 And immediately I was in the spirit: and, behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne. 3 And he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone: and there was a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald. 4 And round about the throne were four and twenty seats: and upon the seats I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment; and they had on their heads crowns of gold. 5 And out of the throne proceeded lightnings and thunders and voices: and there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven Spirits of God. 6 And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto crystal: and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before and behind. 7 And the first beast was like a lion, and the second beast like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle.

We have here an account of a second vision with which the apostle John was favoured. After this,—that is, not only after I had seen the vision of Christ walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks, but after I had taken his messages from his mouth, and written and sent them to the several churches according to his command,—after this I had another vision. Those that will improve the discoveries they have had of God already are prepared thereby for more, and may expect them. Observe,

First. The preparation made for the apostle's having this vision.

1. "A door was opened in heaven." Whence we learn, 1st. That whatever is transacted on earth is first designed and settled in heaven; there is the model of all the works of God; all of them are therefore before his eye, and he lets the inhabitants of heaven see as much of them as it is fit for them. 2nd. We can know nothing of future events but what God is pleased to discover to us; they are within the veil till God opens the door. But, 3rd. So far as God reveals his designs to us we may and ought to receive them, and not pretend to be wise above what is revealed.

2. To prepare John for the vision a trumpet was sounded, and he was called up into heaven to have a sight there of the things which were to be hereafter. He was called into the third heavens. 1st. There is a way opened into the holiest of all, into which the sons of God may enter by faith and holy affections, now in their spirits when they die, and in their whole persons at the last day. 2nd. We must not intrude into the secret of God's presence, but stay till we are called up to it.

3. To prepare for this vision the apostle was in the Spirit, he was in a rapture, as before, ch. i. 10. Whether in the body or out of the body we cannot tell; perhaps he himself could not; however, all bodily actions and sensations were for a time suspended, and his spirit was possessed with the spirit of prophecy, and wholly under a Divine influence. The more we abstract ourselves from all corporeal things, the more fit we are for communion with God; the body is a veil, a cloud and clog to the mind in its transactions with God. We should, as it were, forget it when we go in before the Lord in duty, and be willing to drop it, that we may go up to him in heaven. This was the apparatus to the vision. Now observe,

Secondly. The vision itself. And it begins with the strange sights that the apostle saw, and they were such as these:—

1. He saw a throne set in heaven, the seat of honour, and authority, and judgment. Heaven is the throne of God; there he resides in glory, and from thence he gives laws to the church, and to the whole world; and all earthly thrones are under the jurisdiction of this throne that is set in heaven.

2. He saw a glorious one upon the throne. This throne was not empty, there was one in it that filled it, and that was God, who is here described by those things that are most pleasant and precious in our world; his countenance was like a jasper and a sardine stone; he is not described by any human features, so as to be represented by an image, but only by his transcendent brightness. The jasper is a transparent stone, which yet offers to the eye a variety of the most vivid colours, signifying the glorious perfections of God; the sardine stone is red, signifying the justice of God—that essential attribute which he does never divest himself of in favour of any, but does gloriously exert in the government of the world, and especially of the church, through our Lord Jesus Christ. This attribute is displayed in pardoning as well as in punishing, in saving as well as destroying sinners.

3. "He saw a rainbow about the throne like unto an emerald," ver. 3. The rainbow was the seal and token of the covenant of providence that God made with Noah and his posterity with him, and is a fit emblem of that covenant of is not necessary to suppose that external objects were really presented to the 'waking sense;' there was probably a suspension of the natural use of the faculties, and the mind was supernaturally impressed with ideas adapted to the illustration of the subjects to be revealed" (Webster and Wilkinson).

iv. 3. "He that sat," &c.: the vision of Ezekiel may be profitably compared with the vision in this chapter (see Ezek. i.). "Jasper:" this stone was the last of the twelve in the high-priest's breastplate

(Exod. xxviii. 20), and the first of the twelve foundations of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). It is here emblematical of the Divine glory. The stone which we call jasper does not correspond with the descriptions of the stone so called in Scripture—"most precious," and "like crystal." "Sardine:" the first stone in the high-priest's breastplate (Exod. xxviii. 17), and the sixth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20); a superior variety of agate, and a favourite stone for engraving, on account of its toughness, facility of working, promise that God has made with Christ as the head of the church, and all his people in him; which covenant is as the waters of Noah unto God, an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure. This rainbow looked like the emerald; the most prevailing colour was a pleasant green, to shew the reviving and refreshing nature of the new covenant.

4. He saw four and twenty seats round about the throne, not empty, but filled with four and twenty elders, presbyters, representing, very probably, the whole church of God, both in the Old Testament and New Testament state; not the ministers of the church, but rather the representatives of the people. Their sitting denotes their honour, and their rest, and satisfaction; their sitting about the throne signifies their relation to God, their nearness to him, the sight and enjoyment they have of him, and their continual regards to him. They are clothed in white raiment, the righteousness of the saints, both imputed and inherent; they had on their heads crowns of gold, signifying the honour and authority given them of God, and the glory they have with him. All these may in a lower sense be applied to the gospel church on earth, in its worshipping assemblies; and, in the highest sense, to the church triumphant in heaven.

5. He perceived lightnings and voices proceed out of the throne; that is, the awful declarations that he makes to his church of his sovereign will and pleasure. Thus he gave forth the law on mount Sinai, and the Gospel has not less glory and authority than the law, though it be of a more spiritual nature.

6. He saw seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are explained to be the seven Spirits of God, ver. 5. The various gifts, and graces, and operations of the Spirit of God in the churches of Christ; these are all dispensed according to the will and pleasure of him that sits upon the throne.

7. He saw before the throne a sea of glass, like unto crystal. As in the temple there was a great vessel of brass filled with water, in which the priests were to wash when they went to minister before the Lord, and this was called a sea,—so, in the gospel church, the sea or laver for purification is the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, that cleanses from all sin, even from sanctuary sins. And in this all those must be washed that are admitted into the gracious presence of God on earth, or his glorious presence in heaven.

8. He saw four animals, living creatures, between the throne and the circle of the elders, as seems most probable, standing between God and the people. These seem to signify the ministers of the Gospel, not only because of this their situation nearer to God, and between him and the elders or representatives of the Christian people, and because fewer in number than the people, but as they are here described: 1st. By their many eyes, denoting sagacity, vigilance, and circumspection. 2nd. By their lion-like courage, their great labour and diligence, in which they resemble the ox; their prudence and discretion, becoming men; and their sublime affections and speculations, by which they mount up with wings like eagles towards heaven, ver. 7; and these wings full of eyes within, to shew that in all their meditations and ministrations they are to act with knowledge, and especially should be well acquainted with themselves and the state of their own souls, and see their own concern in the great doctrines and duties of religion, watching over their own souls as well as the souls of the people. 3rd. By their continual employment, and that is praising God, and not ceasing to do so night and day. The elders sit and are ministered unto, they stand and minister, they rest not night and day. This now leads to the other part of the representation.

8 And the four beasts had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: and they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come. 9 And when those beasts give glory and honour and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever, 10 The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, 11 Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.

We have considered the sights that the apostle saw in heaven, now let us observe the songs that he heard, for there is in heaven not only that to be seen that will highly please a sanctified eye, but there is that to be heard that will greatly delight a sanctified ear. It is true concerning the church of Christ here, which is a heaven upon earth, and it will be eminently so in the church made perfect in the heaven of heavens.

First. He heard the song of the four living creatures, or the ministers of the church, which refers to the prophet Isaiah's vision, Isa. vi. And here, 1. They adore one God, and one only, the Lord God Almighty, unchangeable and everlasting. 2. They adore three holies in this one God,—the holy Father, the holy Son, and the holy Spirit,—and these are one infinitely holy and eternal Being, that sits upon the throne, and lives for ever and ever. In this glory the prophet saw Christ and spake of him.

Secondly. He heard the adorations of the four and twenty elders; that is, of the Christian people represented by them; the ministers led, and the people followed in the praises of God, ver. 10, 11. Where observe,

1. The object of their worship, the same with that which the ministers adored, him that sat on the throne, the eternal, ever-living God. The true church of God has one and the same object of worship: two different objects of worship, either co-ordinate or subordinate, would confound the worship and divide the worshippers. It is unlawful to join in Divine worship with those that either mistake or multiply the object. There is but one God, and he alone as God is worshipped by the church on earth and in heaven.

2. The acts of adoration. 1st. They fell down before him that sat on the throne; they discovered the most profound humility, reverence, and godly fear. 2nd. They cast down their crowns before the throne; they gave God the glory of that holiness wherewith he had crowned their souls on earth, and that honour and happiness with which he crowns them in heaven. They owe all their graces and all their glories to him, and acknowledge that his crown is infinitely more glorious than theirs, and that it is their glory to be glorifying God.

3. The words of adoration; they said, "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and power," ver. 11. Observe, 1st. They do not say, We give thee glory, and honour, and power; for what can any creature pretend to give unto God? but they say, "Thou art worthy to receive glory." 2nd. In this they tacitly acknowledge that God was exalted far above all blessing and praise; he was worthy to receive glory, but they were not worthy to praise, nor able to do it, according to his infinite excellencies.

4. We have the ground and reason of their adoration, which is threefold: 1st. He is the Creator of all things, the First Cause; and none but the Creator of all things should be adored, no made thing can be the object of religious worship. 2nd. He is the preserver of all things, and his preservation is a continual creation; they are created still by the sustaining power of God; all beings but God are dependent upon the will and power of God, and no dependent being must be set up as an object of religious worship: it is the part of the best dependent beings to be worshippers, not to be worshipped. 3rd. He is the final cause of all things; "For thy pleasure they are and were created." It was his will and pleasure to create all things; he was not put upon it by the will of another; there is no such thing as a subordinate creator, that acts under and by the will and power of another; and if there were, he ought not to be worshipped: and as he made all things at his pleasure, he made them for his pleasure, to deal with them as he pleases, and to glorify himself by them one way or other. Though he delights not in the death of sinners, but rather that they should turn and live, yet he "hath made all things for himself," Pr. xvi. 4. Now if these be true and sufficient grounds for religious worship, as they are proper to God alone, Christ must needs be God, one with the Father and Spirit, and be worshipped as such; for we find the same causality ascribed to him, Col. i. 16, 17, "All things were created by him, and for him, and he is before all things, and by him all things consist."

CHAPTER V.

In the foregoing chapter the prophetic scene was opened in the sight and hearing of the apostle, and he had a sight of God, the creator and ruler of the world, and the great king of the church. He saw God on the throne of glory and government, surrounded with his holy ones, and receiving their adorations. Now the counsels and decrees of God are set before the apostle, as in a book, which God held in his right hand. And this book is represented, 1. As sealed in the hand of God, ver. 1.—6. 11. As taken into the hand of Christ the Redeemer, to be unsealed and opened, ver. 7 to the end.

AND I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne a book written within and on the backside, sealed with seven seals. 2 And I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof? 3 And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon. 4 And I wept much, because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon. 5 And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: behold, the Lion of the tribe of Juda, the Root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof.

First. He is favoured with a sight of the model and methods of his government, as they are all written down in a book which he holds in his hand; and this we are now to consider as shut up and sealed in the hand of God. Observe, 1. That the designs and methods of Divine providence towards the church and the world are stated and fixed: they are resolved upon, and agreed to, as that which is written in a book: the great design is laid, every part adjusted, all determined, and every thing passed into decree, and made a matter of record. The original and first draught of this book is the book of God's decrees, laid up in his own cabinet, in his eternal mind. But there is a transcript of so much as was necessary to be known in the book of the Scripture in general, in the prophetic part of Scripture especially, and in this prophecy in particular. 2. God holds this book in his right hand, to declare the authority of the book, and his readiness and resolution to execute all the contents thereof, all the counsels and purposes therein recorded. 3. This book in the hand of God is shut up and sealed; it is known to none but himself till he allows it to be opened. Known unto God, and to him alone, are all his works, from the beginning of the world; but it is his glory to conceal the matter as he pleases. The times and seasons, and their great events, he hath kept in his own hand and power. 4. It is "sealed with seven seals." This tells us with what inscrutable secrecy the counsels of God are laid, how impenetrable by the eye and intellect of the creature, and also points us to seven several parts of this book of God's counsels. Each part seems to have its particular seal, and when opened discovers its proper events; and these seven parts are not unsealed and opened at once, but successively, one scene of providence introducing another, and explaining it, till the whole mystery of God's counsel and conduct be finished in the world. [These might be seven sheets or skins of parchment: the first rolled, as was common, on a piece of wood, and sealed; a second rolled and sealed on this; and so forth, till all were sealed. The opening of each seal would then liberate one skin, containing the delineation of a distinct scene. See wood engraving, Ezr. vi. 2.] beauty of colour, and susceptibility of high polish. "Emerald:" this stone was first in the second row of the high-priest's breastplate, and the fourth foundation of the New Jerusalem. Under the word which we here render "emerald" the ancients seem to have included all gems of a fine green colour.

vs. 11. "Thou art worthy, O Lord:" Alford has "our Lord and God," and puts the definite article before the words "glory, honour," &c.: "to receive the glory," &c.

v. 1. "A book:" "To conceive this vision we must imagine a roll of parchment wrapped round a rod. St. John calls it a roll sealed with seven seals by anticipation, for it could not be perceived that it had seven seals till it was unfolded. The seals were broken successively as the volume was unrolled (in separate sheets)."

v. 5. "The Lion of the tribe of Juda . . . hath prevailed:" Alford renders, "The Lion, which is of the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, conquered (so as) to open," &c. The translation "hath Secondly. He heard a proclamation made concerning this sealed book. 1. The crier was "a strong angel;" not that there are any weak ones among the angels in heaven, though there are many among the angels of the churches. This angel seems to come out, not only as a crier, but as a champion, with a challenge to any or all the creatures, to try the strength of their wisdom in opening the counsels of God; and, as a champion, he cried with a loud voice, that every creature might hear. 2. The cry or challenge proclaimed was, "Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof," ver. 2. If there be any creature that thinks himself sufficient either to explain or execute the counsels of God, let him stand forth and make the attempt. 3. None in heaven or earth could accept the challenge, and undertake the task. None in heaven, none of the glorious holy angels, though before the throne of God, and the ministers of his providence; they, with all their wisdom, cannot dive into the decrees of God. None on earth, no man, the wisest or the best of men; none of the magicians and soothsayers; none of the prophets of God, any farther than he reveals his mind to them. "None under the earth;" none of the fallen angels, none of the spirits of men departed, though they should return to our world, can open this book. Satan himself, with all his subtlety, cannot do it; the creatures cannot open it, nor look on it; they cannot read it: God only can do it.

Thirdly. He felt a great concern in himself about this matter: the apostle wept much; it was a great disappointment to him. By what he had seen in him that sat upon the throne, he was very desirous to see and know more of his mind and will; and this desire, when not presently gratified, filled him with sorrow, and fetched many tears from his eyes. Here observe, 1. Those that have seen most of God in this world are most desirous to see more; and they that have seen his glory desire to know his will. 2. Good men may be too eager and too hasty to look into the mysteries of Divine conduct. 3. Such desires, not presently answered, turn to grief and sorrow. Hope deferred makes the heart sick.

Fourthly. The apostle was comforted, and encouraged to hope this sealed book should yet be opened. Here observe, 1. Who it was that gave St. John the hint; "One of the elders." God had revealed it to his church. If angels do not refuse to learn from the church, ministers should not disdain to do it. God can make his people to instruct and inform their teachers when he pleases. 2. Who it was that would do the thing; the Lord Jesus Christ, called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah," according to his Divine nature, alluding to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10; and "the root of David," according to his Divine nature, though a branch of David according to the flesh. He who is a middle person, God and man, and bears the office of Mediator between God and man, is fit and worthy to open and execute all the counsels of God towards men. And this he does in his mediatorial state and capacity, as "the root of David," and "the offspring of Judah," and as the King and Head of the Israel of God; and he will do it to the consolation and joy of all his people.

6 And I beheld, and, lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven Spirits of God sent forth into all the earth. 7 And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne. 8 And when he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints. 9 And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; 10 And hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth. 11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne and the beasts and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; 12 Saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. 13 And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. 14 And the four beasts said, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped him that liveth for ever and ever.

Here, First. The apostle beholds this book taken into the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ, in order to its being opened and executed by him. Here Christ is described, 1. By his place and station; "In the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and of the elders." He was on the same throne with the Father; he was nearer to him than either the elders or ministers of the churches. Christ as man and Mediator is subordinate to God the Father, but is nearer to him than all the creatures; for "in him all the fulness of the Godhead dwells bodily." The ministers stand between God and the people; Christ stands as Mediator between God and both ministers and people. 2. The form in which he appeared. Before he is called a Lion; here he appears "as a Lamb slain." He is a Lion to conquer Satan, a Lamb to satisfy the justice of God. He appears with the marks of his sufferings upon him, to shew that he intercedes in heaven, in the virtue of his satisfaction.

[The Divine nature of our Lord is unchangeable, and incapable of suffering. It was as man that he bore our griefs and carried our sorrows; and the efficacy of these sufferings, in promoting the salvation of man, is derived from the union of his human nature with the Deity. The fact of the Lamb being slain, and redeeming us to God by his blood, is a proper foundation of homage to him who, though he could not die, took the nature which could and did.—J. P. Smith.]

He appears as "a Lamb, having seven horns and seven eyes;" ["seven," a word expressive of perfection,] perfect power to execute all the will of God, and perfect wisdom to understand it all, and to do it in the most effectual manner; for he hath the seven Spirits of God; he has received the Holy Spirit without measure, in all perfection of light, and life, and power, by which he is able to reach and rule all parts of the earth. 3. He is described by his act and deed; "He came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat on the throne," ver. 7; not by violence, nor by fraud; but he prevailed to do it, as, ver. 5, he prevailed by his merit and worthiness; he did it by authority, and by the Father's appointment. God very willingly and justly put the book of his eternal counsels into the hand of Christ, and Christ as readily and gladly took it into his hand; for he delights to reveal and do the will of his Father, Mat. xxviii. 18; Eph. i. 21.

Secondly. The apostle observes the universal joy and thanksgiving that filled heaven and earth upon this transaction. No sooner had Christ received this book out of the Father's hand than he receives the applauses and adorations of angels and men, yea, of every creature. And indeed it is just matter of joy to all the world to see that God does not deal with men in a way of absolute power and strict justice, but in a way of grace and mercy, through the Redeemer. He governs the world not merely as Creator and Lawgiver, but as our God and Saviour. All the world [church] has reason to rejoice in this.

[This act gave unbounded joy to the church, which hailed with a shout of praise her Saviour's entrance on his difficult but glorious work. She knew that his power and wisdom were adequate to its triumphant execution. Though yet afar off, and though many a gloomy dispensation was to intervene, and though many a hard struggle had to be endured, and many a powerful enemy had to be struck down, yet the church confidently anticipated, now that she saw the sealed roll in the hand of the Lamb, the advent of victory, because, though distant, it was certain. She knew that the administration of her Head could have only one issue, and that issue unspeakably glorious and blessed.—S. V.]

The song of praise that was offered up to the Lamb on this occasion consists of three parts; one part sung by the church, another by the church and the angels, the third by every creature.

1. The church begins the doxology, as being more immediately concerned in it, ver. 8, the four living creatures, and "the four and twenty elders," the Christian people under their minister, they lead up the choros. Where observe, 1st. The object of their worship—"the Lamb," the Lord Jesus Christ. It is the declared will of God that all men "should honour the Son as they honour the Father," for he has the same nature. 2nd. Their posture; they "fell down before him," gave him not an inferior sort of worship, but the most profound adoration. 3rd. The instruments used in their adorations; "Harps and vials." The harps were the instruments of praise, the vials of prayer. [Vials, not small bottles, like those we now call by the name of vials, but shallow vessels, in allusion to the censers of gold in which the priests offered incense in the temple.] Prayer and praise should always go together. 4th. The matter of their song; it was suited to the new state of the church, the gospel state in this new Son. First. They acknowledge the infinite fitness and worthiness of the Lord Jesus for this great work of opening and executing the counsel and purposes of God; ver. 9, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; every way sufficient for the work and deserving of the honour. Secondly. They mention the grounds and reasons of this worthiness; and though they do not exclude the dignity of his person as God, without which he had not been sufficient for it, yet they chiefly insist upon the merit of his sufferings, which he had endured for them; these more sensibly struck their souls with thankfulness and joy. Here, 1st. They mention his suffering; "Thou wast slain," slain as a sacrifice; thy blood was shed. 2nd. The fruits of his sufferings. (1.) Redemption to God. Christ has redeemed his people from the bondage of sin, guilt, and Satan; redeemed them to God, set them at liberty to serve him and to enjoy him. (2.) High exaltation; thou "hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth," ver. 10. Every ransomed slave is not immediately preferred to honour; he thinks it a great favour to be restored to liberty. But when the elect of God were made slaves by sin and Satan, in every nation of the world, Christ not only purchased their liberty for them, but the highest honour and preferment, made them kings and priests—kings to rule over their own spirits, and to overcome the world and the evil one; and he has made them priests, given them access to himself, and liberty to offer up spiritual sacrifices; and they "shall reign on earth," they shall with him judge the world at the great day.

2. The doxology thus begun by the church is carried on by the angels. They take the second part, in conjunction with the church, ver. 11. They are said to be innumerable, and to be the attendants on the throne of God, and guardians to the church; and though they did not need a Saviour themselves, yet they rejoice in the redemption and salvation of sinners. And they agree with the church in acknowledging the infinite merits of the Lord Jesus, as dying for sinners, that he is "worthy to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing." 1st. He is worthy of that office and authority, which requires the greatest power and wisdom, the greatest fund, all excellency, to discharge it aright. And, 2nd. That he is worthy of all honour, and glory, and blessing, because he is sufficient for the office, and faithful in it.

3. This doxology, thus begun by the church, and carried on by the angels, is resounded and echoed by the whole creation, ver. 13. Heaven and earth ring with the high praises of the Redeemer; the whole creation fares the better for Christ; "By him all things consist." And all the creatures that had the sense and language would adore that great Redeemer, who delivers the creature from that bondage under which it groans, through the corruption of men and the just curse denounced by the great God upon the fall. That part that, by a prosopopœia, is made for the whole creation, is a song of blessing, and prevailed" tends to put out of sight the reference to the victory of Christ on earth, after which he said, "All power is given unto me in heaven."

v. 8. "When he had taken:" render with Alford, "when he took." "Full of odours;" better, "full of incense." (Compare chap. viii. 4.)

v. 10. "Hast made us," &c.: rather, "didst make us . . . a kingdom and priests." (Compare chap. i. 6.)

vi. 1. "I heard, as it were the noise of thunder:" Alford translates, "I heard one of the living beings saying, as it were the voice of thunder, Come." The words "and see" are omitted by two out of the three oldest MSS. In other MSS. the expression is found, but in different words from the received text. Altogether it seems probable that the words are a later addition. On exegetical grounds the simpler form "Come" is to be preferred. Alford rightly argues that the expression "Come and see" is meaningless as addressed to John.

honour, and glory, and power, 1st. "To him that sitteth on the throne," to God, as God; or to God the Father, as the first person in the Trinity, and the first in the economy of our salvation. And, 2nd. "To the Lamb," as the second person in the Godhead and the Mediator of the new covenant; not that the worship paid to the Lamb is of another nature, an inferior worship, for the very same honour and glory is in the same words ascribed to the Lamb, and to him that sits on the throne; their essence being the same, but their parts in the work of our salvation being distinct, they are distinctly adored. We worship and glorify one and the same God for our creation and for our redemption.

We see how the church that begun the heavenly anthem, finding heaven and earth join in the concert, closes all with their Amen, and end, as they began, with a low prostration before the eternal and everlasting God. Thus we have seen this sealed book passing with great solemnity from the hand of the Creator into the hand of the Redeemer.

[This is a truly noble and instructive chapter, and views of deepest interest present themselves on the comparison of it with the preceding. The book containing the prophecy could be opened and read by none but the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, here called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah" and "Root of David." O blessed Jesus, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, the whole Bible is to me a sealed book; but do thou unseal it to the eye of my mind, and open mine eyes to behold the wondrous things which are contained in it! But what to me is of chiefest concern in this passage is, that here the Lamb of God—not spoken of before, is represented as placed in the very same situation and surrounded by the very same objects with the Lord God Almighty in the preceding chapter—even he who created all things, and for whose pleasure they are and they were created. This Lamb that had been slain had seven horns and seven eyes; and these are said to be the seven Spirits of God, which, in the former description, (ch. iv. 5,) were the seven lamps of fire burning before the throne. What a mysterious union, and incorporation, and identity is here! There God is on the throne, and sat; here Christ is in the midst of the throne, and stood; there the seven Spirits of God are lamps of fire burning before the throne; here they are the seven eyes of the Lamb. Let us view with holy and humble reverence this triune representation of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; and still more, to compensate for the sublime obscurity of such a contemplation, let us rejoice in the unequivocal testimonies here given to the Godhead of the Saviour. Let us especially note the identity of those ascriptions given to the Lamb that was slain, and to Him by whom all things were created: "Worthy is the Lord God Almighty (ch. iv. 8) to receive glory, and honour, and power," (ch. iv. 11); and "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing," ver. 12. And as if to identify or conjoin the Father with the Son, it is again said in ver. 13. "Blessing, honour, glory, and power be to Him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Son, for ever and ever." I would cherish the thought of Christ's divinity; I would mix the consideration of his person with his work—that I may behold in the deity of Christ the completeness of that redemption, the efficacy of that atonement, the regenerative power of that grace by which the restoration of the human family is carried into effect.—Chalmers's Posthumous Works, vol. iv.]

The book of the Divine counsels being thus lodged in the hand of Christ, he loses no time, but immediately enters upon the work of opening the seals and publishing the contents; but this is done in such a manner as still leaves the predictions very abstruse, and difficult to be understood. Hitherto the waters of the sanctuary have been as those in Ezekiel's vision, only to the ankles, or to the knees, or to the loins at least; but here they begin to be a river that cannot be passed over. The visions which John saw, the epistles to the churches, the songs of praise, in the two foregoing chapters, had some things dark and hard to be understood; and yet they were rather "milk for babes" than "meat for strong men." But now we are to launch into the deep, and our business is not so much to fathom it as to let down our net to take a draught. We shall only hint at what seems most obvious. The prophecies of this book are divided into seven seals opened, seven trumpets sounding, and seven vials poured out. It is supposed that the opening of the seven seals discloses those providences that were conversant about the church in the first three centuries, from the ascension of our Lord and Saviour to the reign of Constantine. This was represented in a book rolled up, and sealed in several places; so that, when one seal was opened, you might read so far of it, and so on till the whole was unfolded. Yet we are not here told what was written in the book, but what John saw in figures enigmatical and hieroglyphic; and it is not for us to pretend to know "the times and the seasons, which the Father has put in his own power." In this chapter six of the seven seals are opened, and the visions attending them are related. The first seal in ver. 1, 2; the second seal in ver. 3, 4; the third seal in ver. 5, 6; the fourth seal in ver. 7, 8; the fifth seal in ver. 9—11; the sixth seal in ver. 12, 13, &c., to the end of the chapter.

AND I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard, as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, Come and see. 2 And I saw, and behold a white horse: and he that sat on him had a bow; and a crown was given unto him: and he went forth conquering, and to conquer.

Here, First. Christ the Lamb opens the first seal; he now enters upon the great work of opening and accomplishing the purposes of God towards the church and the world.

Having exhibited in symbol Christ's installation on the right hand of God, and his entrance on his great work, the Apocalypse next presents in figure the various acts of his administration. First of all, the ground had to be cleared. When Christ ascended and sat down at the right hand of God, the ground where he had purposed to plant his church was occupied by the old pagan empire of Rome. A most degrading polytheism, deeply founded in the passions and lusts of men, attired in the garb of a most fascinating poetry, enjoying the venerable prestige of a high antiquity, sanctioned by the laws, and protected and upheld by the military power of the state, was so interwoven with the fabric of the empire that it had become necessary, in order to eradicate the one and strip it of its props and defences, that the framework of the other should be shaken and rent. This was accomplished in the opening of the seals.—S. V.]

Secondly. One of the ministers of the church calls upon the apostle, with a voice like thunder, to come near and observe what then appeared.

Thirdly. We have the vision itself, ver. 2.

1. The Lord Jesus appears riding on "a white horse." White horses are generally refused in war, because they make the rider a mark for the enemy; but our Lord Redeemer was sure of the victory, and a glorious triumph, and he rides on the white horse of a pure but despised Gospel, with great swiftness through the world.

2. He had "a bow" in his hand. The convictions impressed by the word of God are sharp arrows; they reach at a distance, and, though the ministers of the word draw the bow at a venture, God can and will direct it to the joints of the harness; this bow, in the hand of Christ, "abides in strength," and, like that of Jonathan, never returns empty.

3. "A crown" was given him; importing that all who receive the Gospel must receive Christ as a king, and must be his loyal and obedient subjects; he will be glorified in the success of the Gospel. When Christ was going to war, one would think a helmet had been more proper than a crown; but a crown is given him as the earnest and emblem of victory.

4. "He went forth conquering, and to conquer." As long as the church continues militant Christ will be conquering; when he has conquered his enemies in one age he meets with new ones in another age. Men go on opposing, and Christ goes on conquering; and his former victories are pledges of future victories. He conquers his enemies in his people; their sins are their enemies and his enemies. When Christ comes with power into their soul he begins to conquer these enemies, and he goes on conquering in the progressive work of sanctification till he has gained us a complete victory; and he conquers his enemies in the world, wicked men, some by bringing them to his foot, others by making them his footstool. Observe from this seal opened, 1st. That the successful progress of the Gospel of Christ in the world is a glorious sight, worth beholding, the most pleasant and welcome sight that a good man can see in this world. 2nd. That whatever convulsions and revolutions happen in the states and kingdoms of the world, the kingdom of Christ shall be established and enlarged in spite of all opposition. 3rd. That a morning of opportunity usually goes before a night of calamity. The Gospel is preached before the plagues are poured forth. 4th. Christ's work is not all done at once. We are ready to think when the Gospel goes forth it should carry all the world before it; but it often meets with opposition, and moves slowly. However, Christ will do his own work effectually, in his own time and way.

THE ROMAN HORSE.

[The first four seals are characterised by the symbol of a horse, and appear to indicate one object, which is held by Mr. Elliott, in his recent work (Horæ Apocryphæ) to be, not the Christian church, under the direction of the Redeemer, but a nation or empire, and, in his opinion, the Roman empire, which adopted the horse as its national emblem; as Persia did the ram, and Macedonia the goat. He shews that it was, in fact, one of the ancient Roman standards, and that coins still exist, as represented in the wood engraving, illustrative of this recognised connexion as referring to the different character of the events which befell the empire; the riders as pointing out the chief agents or agencies, such as the Roman emperors or others, by whom it would be acted upon; and the crown, the bow, the sword, and the balance, as serving more particularly and accurately to distinguish who the parties were, and what the period in which they flourished. 'Forasmuch' (he says, in his Review of Evidence, vol. iv.) 'as the colour on the successive horses, interpreted agreeably with the Roman and Greek understanding of them, did conjunctively, with certain explanatory words in each case accompanying, indicate states respectively of national triumph, happiness, and prosperity, of bloody civil war, of impoverishment and want, and of extraordinary mortality,—this last by the agencies of sword, famine, pestilence, and wild beasts, such as to cause, in the horse, the hue of a body in dissolution,—it was inferred that successive eras of prosperity, civil war, impoverishment, and mortality corresponding, were portended to the Roman empire; the first to begin very soon, according to the revealing angel's express pre-intimation, (Apoc. iv. 1) after the time of St. John's banishment in Patmos; the rest to follow in succession. Can we well have been wrong in these our inferences as to the meaning of the symbols? And what then the result of appeal to history in verification of them? It was found that Gibbon marked out four eras, or epochs, in the Roman imperial history, precisely agreeing with the prefigurations;—the first, one of both early and later signal triumphs, and moreover of a prolonged general happiness and prosperity unexampled, he says, in the world's history, beginning from Nerva's accession, the very next year after St. John's seeing the vision in Patmos, and lasting eighty years and more, to the death of the second Antonine; the second, one of civil war and bloodshed, almost as remarkable, begun with the murder of Antonine's son and successor, Commodus, near the end of the second century, and extended, with intervals of intermission, far onwards into the eras of the two next seals; the third, one of fiscal oppression, and consequent impoverishment and distress of the Roman people, dated by Gibbon from a memorable edict of the emperor Caracalla, issued towards the close of the first quarter of the third century, and noted by him as one of the permanent causes of the empire's decline; the fourth, beginning about twenty years later, one of some twenty years and more of continued mortality, through three chiefly out of the four predicted agencies of destruction, to an extent such, he says, that we might suspect, from certain statistical tables, 'that war, pestilence, and

But if we understand the word "Come" in each of the seals addressed to Him whose very title (chap. i. 4) is the Coming One, then we hear in it the universal cry of the Church in all ages. (See verse 10, xxi. 17, 20; and compare 2 Peter iii. 4, James v. 8.) On the interpretation of the seals it will be seen that very different opinions prevail. The Notes above, enclosed within brackets, give a valuable resumé of Elliott's views. His work, as the ablest exposition of the views of the historical school of interpreters, is worthy of careful study; but the interpretations suggested by the writers of this school far from exhaust the significance of the prophecies. It seems quite in harmony with the scriptural system of prophecy to believe that one event contemplated by a prediction by no means represents its entire fulfilment. The familiar example of the prophecies of Matt. xxiv., where the siege of Jerusalem and the final coming of Christ are foretold in mingled terms, serves to confirm this view.

vi. 2. "Crown:" the word here is stephanos, and is usually famine had consumed in a few years a moiety of the human species,' and with such effect on the empire as to make it seem as if 'approaching to the last and fatal moment of its dissolution.'—E.]

3 And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come and see. 4 And there went out another horse that was red: and power was given to him that sat thereon to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another: and there was given unto him a great sword. 5 And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come and see. And I beheld, and lo a black horse; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. 6 And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine. 7 And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see. 8 And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth.

The next three seals give us a sad prospect of great and desolating judgments, with which God uses to punish those that either refuse or abuse the everlasting Gospel. Though some understand them of the persecutions that befell the church of Christ, and others of the destruction of the Jews, they rather seem more generally to represent God's terrible judgments, by which he avenges the quarrel of his covenant upon those that make light of it.

First. Upon opening the second seal, to which John was called to attend, another horse appears, of a different colour from the former, "a red horse," ver. 4. This signifies the desolating judgment of war. He that sat upon this red horse had power to take peace from the earth, and that the inhabitants of the earth should kill one another. Who this was that sat upon the red horse, whether Christ himself, as Lord of hosts, or the instruments that he raised up to conduct the war, is not clear; but this is certain, 1. That those who will not submit to the bow of the Gospel must expect to be cut in sunder by the sword of Divine justice. 2. That Jesus Christ rules and commands, not only in the kingdom of grace, but of providence. And, 3. That the sword of war is a dreadful judgment. It takes away peace from the earth, one of the greatest blessings, and it puts men upon killing one another. Men that should love one another, and help one another, are, in a state of war, set upon killing one another.

Secondly. Upon opening the third seal, which John is bid to observe, another horse appears, different from the former, "a black horse," signifying famine, that terrible judgment; and he that sat on that horse "had a pair of balances in his hand," ver. 5; signifying that men must now eat their bread by weight, as was threatened, Lev. xxvi. 26, "They shall deliver your bread to you by weight." That which follows in the 6th verse, of the voice that cried, "A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine," has made some expositors think this was not a vision of famine, but of plenty. But if we consider the quantity of their measure, and the value of their penny, at the time of this prophecy, the objection will be removed. Their measure was but a single quart, and their penny was our sevenpence-halfpenny, and that is a great deal to give for a quart of wheat. However, it seems this famine, as all others, fell most severely upon the poor; whereas the oil and the wine, which were dainties of the rich, were not hurt. But if bread, the staff of life, be broken, dainties will not supply the place of it.

[Whereas it seems reasonable to suppose that in perfect prefigurative pictures, such as all must be that have a Divine original, not the mere nature only, but the instrumental causes also, of these states of prosperity or of suffering might probably be revealed, and the riders of the horses characterised by their respective badges in the vision appeared to be the fit symbols to foreshew it,—a comparison was instituted in each vision between the prophecy and the history on this point also. And on examination it appeared that whereas, according to Gibbon's declaration, the instrumental causes of the white of the first era were the five good emperors, from Nerva to the second Antonine inclusive, (a line united as one by successive adoptions, and, as traced up to Nerva, its head, of Cretic original;) of the red of the second era those that had the power of the sword, that is, the military power, including its chief generals very specially; and of the black of the third era the provincial governors in their several provinces of administration,—so, 1. The crown, the imperial crown, given to the rider of the white horse, did in fact mark him out as the representative of emperors, and the bow in his hand (strange as this might appear) as the representative, according to clear antiquarian evidence, of persons of Cretan provincial origin. 2. The sword given to the rider of the red horse (the word 'given,' where used and where omitted, should not be unnoticed) marked him out as the representative of the soldiery generally, and more particularly of the prætorian prefects and imperial lieutenants; these being at Rome and in the provinces respectively the only functionaries invested with the judicial power of the sword over the soldiers, as well as military use of it against the enemy, and in token thereof solemnly presented with a sword within or outside of the walls of Rome. 3. The holding of the balance, and the words addressed to him from the throne respecting the corn, wine, and oil, did as distinctively mark out the rider of the black horse to be the representative of Roman provincial governors—the balance being the emblem struck by them frequently on their own coins, in promise of equity of administration, upon their appointment to office, (on which, as on other points, medals were exhibited to the reader's eye in evidence,) and the words from the throne almost the very words addressed by the Roman law (as well as by that equity which is ascribed to God's throne in Scripture) to these provincial administrators. As to the rider of the fourth horse, his name and appearance, Death, might have been supposed sufficient of itself to indicate that he was the personification of every destroying power of human life. As if, however, to guard against the view of him as a mere destroyer of political life, Hades, or the grave, was seen to follow as his badge, the gaping recipient of the spoil of corpses.—E.]

Here observe, 1. That when a people loathe their spiritual food, God may justly deprive them of their daily bread. 2. That one judgment seldom comes alone, and the judgment of war naturally draws after it that of famine; and those that will not humble themselves under one judgment must expect another and yet greater; for when God contends he will prevail. The famine of bread is a terrible judgment, but the famine of the word is more so, though careless sinners are not sensible of it.

Thirdly. Upon the fourth seal, which John is commanded to observe, there appears another horse, "of a pale colour." Where observe, 1. The name of the rider, "Death," the king of terrors; the pestilence, which is death in its empire, death reigning over a place or nation; death on horseback, marching about, and making fresh conquests every hour. 2. The attendants or followers of this king of terrors; and that is, "hell," a state of eternal misery to all those that die in their sins; and in times of such a general destruction multitudes go down unprepared into the valley of destruction. It is an awful thought, and enough to make the whole world to tremble, that eternal damnation immediately follows upon the death of an impenitent sinner. [Death and Hades, Rev. xx. 13.] Observe, 1st. There is a natural as well as judicial connexion between one judgment and another. War is a wasting calamity, and draws scarcity and famine after it; and famine, not allowing men proper sustenance, and forcing them to take that which is unwholesome, often draws the pestilence after it. 2nd. God's quiver is full of arrows; he is never at a loss for ways and means to punish a wicked people. 3rd. In the book of God's counsels he has prepared judgments for scorners as well as mercy for returning sinners. 4th. In the book of the Scriptures God hath published threatenings against the wicked as well as promises to the righteous; and it is our duty to observe and believe the threatenings as well as the promises.

Fourthly. After the opening of these seals of approaching judgments, and the distinct account of them, we have this general observation, That God gave power to them "over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with the sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth," ver. 8; he gave them power, that is, those instruments of his anger, or those judgments themselves. He that holds the winds in his hand has all public calamities at his command, and they can only go when he sends them, and no farther than he permits. To the three great judgments of war, famine, and pestilence, is here added "the beasts of the earth," another of God's sore judgments, mentioned Eze. xiv. 21, and mentioned here the last; because when a nation is depopulated by the sword, famine, and pestilence, the small remnant that continue in a waste and howling wilderness encourage the wild beasts to make head against them, and they become an easy prey. Others, by the beasts of the field, understand brutish, cruel, savage men, that, having divested themselves of all humanity, delight to be the instruments of the destruction of others.

9 And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: 10 And they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth? 11 And white robes were given unto every one of them; and it was said unto them, that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow servants also and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled. 12 And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and, lo, there was a great earthquake; and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; 13 And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig tree casteth her untimely figs, when she is shaken of a mighty wind. 14 And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together applied to the wreath of the victor; a different word is employed in chap. xix. 12. There the sacred personage appears crowned with diadems—the crowns of kingship.

vi. 4. "Red," or "fiery red." "The word here used for 'sword' is not the same as that employed in verse 8. The word there used denotes the barbarian scimitar here the imperial sword" (Webster and Wilkinson).

vi. 5. "Balances:" Woodhouse and others rendered the word

"yoke" instead of "balances." It is so rendered elsewhere in the New Testament. They interpret the vision as signifying the bondage of ceremonial and superstitious observance. (Compare Acts xv. 10.) But the translation "balances" is now generally preferred, and better suits the tenor of the passage.

vi. 6. "A measure:" literally, a chanix, a measure equivalent to two or three pints. A chanix of grain was the daily allowance for a soldier, whose pay was a penny (denarius) a day. (Compare Matt.

and every mountain and island were moved out of their places. 15 And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every free man, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; 16 And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb: 17 For the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?

A VASE OF MARTYR'S BLOOD IN THE CATACOMBS AT ROME.

In the remaining part of this chapter we have the opening of the fifth and the sixth seals.

First. The fifth seal. And here is no mention made of any one that called the apostle to make his observation; either because the decorum of the vision was to be observed, and each of the four living creatures had discharged their duty of a monitor before, or because the events here opened lay out of the sight, and beyond the time of the present ministers of the church; or because it does not contain a new prophecy of any future events, but rather opens a spring of support and consolation to those that had been, and still were, under great tribulation for the sake of Christ and the Gospel. Here observe,

1. The sight this apostle saw at the opening of the fifth seal; and it was a very affecting sight; ver. 9, "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held." He saw the souls of the martyrs. Here observe, 1st. Where he saw them; "Under the altar;" at the foot of the altar of incense, in the most holy place. He saw them in heaven, at the foot of Christ. Hence note, First. That persecutors can only kill the body, and after that there is no more that they can do, their souls live. Secondly. God has provided a good place in the better world for those who are faithful to death, and are not allowed a place any longer on earth. Thirdly. That holy martyrs are very near to Christ in heaven; they have the highest place there. Fourthly. That it is not their own death, but the sacrifice of Christ, that gives them a reception into heaven, and a reward there; they do not wash their robes in their own blood, but in the blood of the Lamb. 2nd. What was the cause in which they suffered; "The word of God, and the testimony which they held;" for believing the word of God, and attesting or confessing the truth of it. This profession of their faith they held fast without wavering, even though they died for it. A noble cause! the best that any man can lay down his life for: faith in God's word, and a confession of that faith.

2. The cry he heard. It was a loud cry, and contains a humble expostulation about the long delay of avenging justice against their enemies; "How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?" ver. 10. Observe, 1st. That even "the spirits of just men made perfect" retain a proper resentment of the wrong they have sustained by their cruel enemies; and, though they die in charity, praying, as Christ did, that God would forgive them, yet they are desirous that, for the honour of God, and Christ, and the Gospel, and for the terror and conviction of others, God will take a just revenge upon the sin of persecution, even while he pardons and saves the persecutors. 2nd. That they commit their cause to him "to whom vengeance belongeth," and leave it in his hand; they are not for avenging themselves, but leave all to God. 3rd. That there will be joy in heaven at the destruction of the implacable enemies of Christ and Christianity, as well as at the conversion of other sinners. When Babylon falls, it will be said, "Rejoice over her, O thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her," ch. xviii. 20.

3. He observed the kind return that was made to this cry, ver. 11, both what was given them, and what was said to them. 1st. What was given to them: "White robes," the robes of victory and of honour. Their present happiness was an abundant recompence of their past sufferings.

[These persons are described as slain, and the giving to them white robes must refer to their being immediately admitted, says Scott, into a state of felicity as accepted and holy.—White robes are given unto every one of them, as a token of their justification and acceptance with God; and they are exhorted to rest for a season, till the number of the martyrs be completed, when they shall receive their full reward. Where Mr. Lowman observes very well, that "this representation seems much to favour the immediate happiness of departed saints, and hardly to consist with that uncomfortable opinion, the insensible state of departed souls, till after the resurrection." The scene is laid in heaven, and the scenery is drawn in allusion to (Num. i. 1) the encampment of the children of Israel in the wilderness. God is represented sitting on his throne, as in the tabernacle, much in the same manner as the prophet Ezekiel (Eze. i. 26-28) hath described him. Next to the tabernacle the priests and Levites, and next to the throne were four and twenty elders sitting, answering to the princes of the four and twenty courses of the Jewish priests, clothed in white raiment as emblems of their purity and sanctity; and they had on their heads crowns of gold, Christ having made them (1 Pet. ii. 9) a royal priesthood, and (Rev. v. 10) kings and priests unto God. Before the throne there was also a sea of glass, like unto crystal, answering to the great molten sea or laver in the temple of Solomon; and in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, that is, before and behind, and on each side of the throne, were four beasts, or rather four living creatures, (Gen.) representing the heads of the whole congregation in the four quarters of the world, and resembling the cherubim and seraphim in Ezekiel's and Isaiah's visions, Eze. i. x; x. 14; Isa. vi. 2, 3.—Bp. Newton.]

2nd. What was said to them; that they should be satisfied, and easy in themselves, for it would not be long but the number of their fellow-sufferers should be fulfilled. This is a language rather suited to the imperfect state of the saints in this world, than to the perfection of their state in heaven. There is no impatience, no uneasiness, no need of admonition; but in this world there is great need of patience.

[The Christian church and fathers passed through and out of the period of the fifth seal, and of the persecutions referred to in it, with the distinct conviction impressed on their minds, even as by a voice from heaven, that there only needed to be completed another and different series of martyrs, namely, those to be slain under antichrist; and that then, without farther delay, their Redeemer would surely manifest himself, and execute final vengeance on their enemies.—E.]

Observe, First. There is a number of Christians known to God, that are appointed as sheep for the slaughter, set apart to be God's witnesses. Secondly. That, as the measure of the sin of persecutors is filling up, so is the number of the persecuted, martyred servants of Christ. Thirdly. That, when this number is fulfilled, God will take a just and glorious revenge upon their cruel persecutors; he will recompense tribulation to those that trouble them, and to those that are troubled full and uninterrupted rest.

[There were other persecutions before, but this was by far the most considerable, the tenth and last general persecution, which was begun by Diocletian, and continued by others, and lasted longer, and extended farther, and was sharper and more bloody than any or all preceding; and therefore this was particularly predicted. Eusebius and Lactantius, who were two eye-witnesses, have written large accounts of it. Orosius asserts that this persecution was longer and more cruel than all the past; for it raged incessantly for ten years, by burning the churches, proscribing the innocent, and slaying the martyrs. Sulpicius Severus, too, describes it as the most bitter persecution, which for ten years together depopulated the people of God: at which time all the world almost was stained with the sacred blood of the martyrs, and was never more exhausted by any wars. So that this became a memorable era to the Christians, under the name of the era of Diocletian, or, as it is otherwise called, the era of martyrs.—Bp. Newton.]

In the catacombs at Rome, (see Note on 1 Thes. iv. 13.) whether the persecuted Christians fled for concealment in that day of trouble, memorials still exist with inscriptions rudely sculptured to their memory, and vases of small size sometimes beside them, inscribed with the single but significant word, 'Sanguis,' (blood ver. 10,) whereinto had been poured, as would seem, what the Christian bystanders could collect of life in the ebbing flood at the scene of martyrdom.—E.

In Christ. Alexander is not dead, but lives above the stars, and his body rests in this tomb. He ended his life under the emperor Antonine, who, foreseeing that great benefit would result from his services, returned evil for good. For, while on his knees, and about to sacrifice to the true God, he was led away to execution. O sad times! in which, among sacred rites and prayers, even in caverns, we are not safe. What can be more wretched than such a life? and what than such a death? when they cannot be buried by their friends and relations—at length they sparkle in heaven. He has scarcely lived, who has lived in Christian times.

The first of these celebrates the universal extinction of the Christian superstition in the East, and the propagation of polytheism under Diocletian and Galerius. The second extols Diocletian and Maximian for having extended the Roman empire, and extinguished the name of the Christians, who were overturning the republic. We have here a monument raised by paganism over the grave of its vanquished foe. But in this "the people imagined a vain thing;" so far from being deceased, Christianity was on the eve of final and permanent triumph, and the stone guarded a sepulchre empty as the urn which Electra washed with her tears. Neither in Spain nor elsewhere can be pointed out the burial-place of Christianity; "it is not: for the living hath no tomb."

Secondly, We have here the sixth seal opened, ver. 12. Some refer this to the great revolutions in the empire in Constantine's time, the downfall of paganism; others, with great probability, to the destruction of Jerusalem, as an emblem of the general judgment and destruction of the wicked at the end of the world. And, indeed, the awful characters of this event are so much the same with those signs mentioned by our Saviour, as foreboding the destruction of Jerusalem, that it hardly leaves any room for doubting but that the same thing is meant in both places, though some think that event was past already: see Mat. xxiv. 29, 30.

The general intent of this vision does not seem to me to have been difficult to understand. It surely betokened some sudden and extraordinary revolution in the Roman empire, which would follow chronologically after the era of martyrdoms depicted under the seal preceding; a revolution arising from the triumph of the Christian cause over its enemies, and in degree complete and universal. Doubtless, according to mere human probabilities, it must have appeared most unlikely that such a consummation should be brought about, and at such a time,—a time when Christians constituted but a small minority of the population, and when, by the long previous persecution, they had been reduced apparently to the lowest point of depression. But unto Him who ruleth all things after his will, both in heaven and on earth, what are difficulties, what are improbabilities, to frustrate the accomplishment of his declared purpose? Rather, as has been often and most truly observed, man's extremity is God's opportunity. That precisely at the time depicted in the vision,—the time following on the era of the Diocletian martyrdoms,—a revolution of the character described took place in the Roman empire, is one of the most memorable and most astonishing facts of history,—a revolution, Mr. E. elsewhere says, 'sudden, and accomplished through fierce wars, in which the forces on either side were recognised as respectively the champions of paganism and Christianity; the result of which was that, within some ten or fifteen years after, the whole power of paganism was swept from its elevation in the political heavens, and ere the lapse of half a century more, nearly the whole Roman empire, in respect of religious profession, converted into a Christianized kingdom. Nor let me omit to observe, in farther confirmation of this explanation, that the infidel illustration of the apocalyptic prefiguration fails us here, as usual, to add his corroborative testimony. The ruin of the pagan religion, says Gibbon, is described by the sophists as a dreadful and amazing prodigy, which covered the earth with darkness, and restored the ancient dominion of chaos and of night.'—E. The above author, whilst thus considering the civil establishment of Christianity, as denoted by the description in ver. 12—17, illustrates such an application of the strong language there used, by referring to passages of Scripture where similar terms are employed in relation to similar events: Isa. xlii. 9; Jer. iv. 23; Eze. xxxii. 7, 8, 11; Hos. x. 8. Here observe,

1. The tremendous events that were hastening; and here are several occurrences that contribute to make that day and dispensation very dreadful. 1st. "There was a great earthquake." This may be taken in a political sense; the very foundations of the Jewish church and state would be terribly shaken, though they seemed to be as stable as the earth itself. 2nd. "The sun became black as sackcloth of hair," either naturally, by a total eclipse, or politically, by the fall of the chief rulers and governors of the land. 3rd. The moon should become as blood. The inferior officers, or their military men, they should be all wallowing in their own blood. 4th. The stars of heaven should fall to the earth, ver. 13; and that "as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken of a mighty wind." The stars may signify all the men of note and influence among them, though in lower spheres of activity there should be a general desolation. 5th. The heaven should depart as a scroll when it is rolled together. That may intend, their ecclesiastical state shall perish and be laid aside for ever. 6th. Every mountain and island shall be moved out of their places. The destruction of the Jewish nation should affect and affright all the nations round about; those that were highest in honour, and those that seemed to be best secured. It would be a judgment that should astonish all the world. This leads to, countenance of "him that sitteth on the throne, and the wrath of the Lamb. Observe, First. That which is matter of displeasure to Christ is so to God. They are so entirely one that what pleases or displeases the one pleases or displeases the other. Secondly. Though God be invisible, he can make the inhabitants of this world sensible of his awful frowns. Thirdly. Though Christ be a Lamb, yet he can be angry, even to wrath, and that the wrath of the Lamb is exceeding dreadful: for if the Redeemer, that appeases the wrath of God, himself be our wrathful enemy, where shall we have a friend to plead for us? They perish without remedy that perish by the wrath of the Redeemer. Fourthly. That, as men have their day of opportunity, and their seasons of grace, so God has his day of righteous wrath; and when that day comes, the most stout-hearted sinners will not be able to stand before him. All these terrors actually fell upon the sinners in Judea and Jerusalem, in the day of their destruction, and they will all, in the utmost degree, fall upon impenitent sinners at the general judgment of the last day.

2. The dread and terror that would seize upon all sorts of men in that great and awful day, ver. 15. Neither authority, nor grandeur, nor riches, nor valour, nor strength, would be able to support men at that time. Yea, the very poor slaves, that one would think had nothing to fear, because they had nothing to lose, would be all in amazement at that day. Here observe, 1st. The degree of their terror and astonishment; it should prevail so far as to make them, like distracted, desperate men, to call to the mountains to fall upon them, and to the hills to cover them; they would be glad to be no more seen; yea, to have no longer any being. 2nd. The cause of their terror; and that was, the angry

The things contained in this chapter come in after the opening of the six seals, which foretold great calamities in the world, and before the sound of the seven trumpets, which gave notice of great corruptions arising in the church. Between these comes in this comfortable chapter, which secures the graces and comforts of the people of God in times of common calamity. We have, I. An account of the restraint laid upon the winds, ver. 1—3. II. The sealing of the servants of God, ver. 4—8. III. The songs of angels and saints on this occasion, ver. 9—12. IV. A description of the honour and happiness of those that had faithfully served Christ, and suffered for him, ver. 13 to the end.

AND after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree. 2 And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea, 3 Saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.

Here we have an account of the restraint laid upon the winds. By these winds, we suppose, are meant those errors and corruptions in religion which would occasion a great deal of trouble and mischief to the church of God. Sometimes the Holy Spirit is compared to the wind; here the spirits of error are compared to the four winds, contrary one to another, but doing much hurt to the church, the garden and vineyard of God; breaking the branches, and blasting the fruits of his plantation. The devil is called "the prince of the power of the air;" he by a great wind overthrew the house of Job's eldest son. Errors are as wind, by which they that are unstable are shaken and carried to and fro, Eph. iv. 14. Observe, 1. These are called "the winds of the earth," because they blow only in these lower regions near the earth. Heaven is always clear and free from them. 2. They are restrained by the ministry of angels, "standing on the four corners of the earth;" intimating that the spirit of error cannot go forth till God permits it, and that the angels minister to the good of the church by restraining its enemies. 3. Their restraint was only for a season; and that was, till the servants of God were sealed in their foreheads. God has a particular care and concern for his own servants in times of temptation and corruption; and he has a way to secure them from the common infection. He first establishes them, and then he tries them; he has the timing of their trials in his own hand.

4 And I heard the number of them which were sealed: and there were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel. 5 Of the tribe of Juda were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Gad were sealed twelve thousand. 6 Of the tribe of Aser were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Nephthali were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Manasses were sealed twelve thousand. 7 Of the tribe of Simeon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Levi were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Issachar were sealed twelve thousand. 8 Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

blast of destruction (Isa. xxvii. 8) our Lord's promise that for the elect's sake, whom the Lord had chosen, he would shorten the days of tribulation (Matt. xxiv. 22)."

vii. 5—8. The tribe of Dan is omitted in the list. Besides the conjecture given in the Notes above, it appears that there is Hebrew authority for saying that the tribe of Dan had been for long extinct. It was reduced to the one family of Hussim, which afterwards perished. A passage in the Old Testament (2 Chron. ii. 14) suggests that the Danites had not kept their lineage pure, but had intermarried with the Phœnicians. The omission of the tribe in the genealogies (1 Chron. ii. —xii.) may be accounted for by the supposition that its genealogies had perished, and that little care had been taken to preserve the records of a tribe which had left its original seat (compare Judges xviii.), near the head quarters of the nation, and given its name to a distant city notorious only as the seat of a rival and idolatrous worship.

We have here an account of the sealing of the servants of God. Where observe, 1. To whom this work was committed; to an "angel," another angel. While some of the angels were employed to restrain Satan and his agents, another angel was employed to mark out and distinguish the faithful servants of God. 2. How they were distinguished; a seal of God was set upon their foreheads; a seal known to him, and as plain as if it appeared in their forehead. By this mark they were set apart for mercy and safety in the worst of times. 3. The number of those that were sealed. Where observe, 1st. A particular account of those that were sealed of the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve thousand out of every tribe; the whole sum amounting to an hundred and forty-four thousand. In this list the tribe of Dan is omitted, perhaps because they were greatly addicted to idolatry; and the order of the tribes is altered, perhaps according as they had been more or less faithful to God. Some take these to be a select number of the Jews, that were reserved for mercy, at the destruction of Jerusalem; others think that time was past, and therefore it is to be more generally applied to God's chosen remnant in the world. But if the destruction of Jerusalem was not yet over, (and I think it is hard to prove that it was,) it seems more proper to understand this of the remnant of that people which God had reserved according to the election of grace; only here we have a definite number for an indefinite. 2nd. A general account of those that were saved out of other nations; ver. 9, "A great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues." Though these are not said to be sealed, yet they were selected by God out of all nations, and brought into his church, and there stood before the throne. Observe, First. God will have a greater harvest of souls among the Gentiles than he had among the Jews; more are the children of the desolate than of the married woman. Secondly. The Lord knows who are his, and he will keep them safe in times of dangerous temptation. Thirdly. That though the church of God is but a little flock in comparison of the wicked world, yet it is no contemptible society, but really large, and to be still more enlarged.

9 After this I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; 10 And cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb. 11 And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, 12 Saying, Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

Here we have the songs of saints and angels on this occasion. Where observe.

First. The praises offered up by the saints, and, as it seems to me, by the Gentile believers for the care of God in reserving so large a remnant of the Jews, and saving them from infidelity and destruction. The Jewish church prayed for the Gentiles before their conversion, and the Gentile churches have reason to bless God for his distinguishing mercy to so many of the Jews when the rest were cut off. Here observe, 1. The posture of these praising saints; they "stood before the throne, and before the Lamb;" before the Creator and the Mediator. In acts of religious worship we come nigh to God, and are to conceive ourselves as in his special presence. And we must come to God by Christ; the throne of God would be inaccessible to sinners, were it not for a Mediator. 2. Their habit; they were "clothed with white robes, and had palms in their hands." They were invested with the robes of justification, holiness, and victory; and had palms in their hands, as conquerors used to appear in their triumphs. Such a glorious appearance will the faithful servants of God make at last, when they have "fought the good fight of faith," and finished their course. 3. Their employment; they "cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God, which sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb." This may be understood either as a hosannah, wishing well to the interest of God and Christ in the church and in the world, or as a hallelujah, giving to God and the Lamb the praise of the great salvation. Both the Father and the Son are joined together in these praises; the Father contrived this salvation, the Son purchased it; and they that enjoy it must and will bless the Lord and the Lamb; and they will do it publicly, and with becoming fervour.

Secondly. Here is the song of the angels, ver. 11, 12; where observe, 1. Their station; "Before the throne of God," attending on him, and about the saints, ready to serve them. 2. Their posture, which is very humble, and expressive of the greatest reverence; "They fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God." Behold the most excellent of all the creatures, that never sinned, that are before him continually, not only covering their faces, but falling down on their faces before the Lord! What humility, then, and what profound reverence, become us vile, frail creatures, when we come into the presence of God! We should fall down before him; there should be both a reverential frame of spirit and a humble behaviour in all our addresses to God. 3. Their praises; they consented to the praises of the saints, said their Amen thereto. There is in heaven a perfect harmony between the angels and the saints. And then they added more of their own, "saying, Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might, be unto our God, for ever and ever, Amen." Where, 1st. They acknowledge the glorious attributes of God, his wisdom, his power, and his might. 2nd. They declare that, for these his Divine perfections, he ought to be blessed, and praised, and glorified to all eternity, and they confirm it by their Amen. We see what is the work of heaven, and we ought to begin it now; to get our hearts tuned for it, to be much in it, and long for that world where our praises, as well as happiness, will be perfect.

13 And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white

vii. 9. "White robes . . . palms." palms were the symbol of joy and triumph. They were used at the feast of tabernacles (the fifteenth day of the seventh month), when they held the feast of thanksgiving for the ingathered fruits. The allusions to Jewish customs must be noted if we would rightly understand the symbolism of the Apocalypse.

vii. 11. "Beasts;" to be rendered here, as in chap. iv., "beings," or "living beings."

robes? and whence came they? 14 And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. 15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them. 16 They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. 17 For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters: and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Here we have a description of the honour and happiness of those that have faithfully served the Lord Jesus Christ, and suffered for him. Where observe,

First. A question asked by one of the elders, not for his own information, but for John's instruction. Ministers may learn from the people, especially from aged and experienced Christians. The lowest saint in heaven knows more than the greatest apostle in the world. Now the question has two parts: 1. "What are these which are arrayed in white robes?" 2. "Whence came they?" It seems to be spoken by way of admiration, as Cant. iii. 6, "Who is this that cometh out of the wilderness?" Faithful Christians deserve our notice and respect; we should "mark the upright."

Secondly. The answer returned by the apostle; in which he tacitly acknowledges his own ignorance, and sues to this elder for information, "Thou knowest." Those that would gain knowledge must not be ashamed to own their ignorance, nor to desire instruction from any that are able to give it.

Thirdly. The account given to the apostle concerning that noble army of martyrs that "stood before the throne of God," with white robes and palms of victory in their hands; and of them it is here observed, 1. The low and desolate state they had formerly been in; they had been in "great tribulation," persecuted by men, tempted by Satan, sometimes troubled in their own spirits; they had suffered the spoiling of their goods, the imprisonment of their persons, yea, the loss of life itself. The way to heaven lies through many tribulations; but tribulation, how great soever, shall not separate us from the love of God. Tribulation, when gone through well, will make heaven more welcome and more glorious. [These are they which are to come, οι ἐρχόμενοι.] 2. The means by which they had been prepared for that great honour and happiness they now enjoyed; ver. 14, they had "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." It is not the blood of the martyrs themselves, but the blood of the Lamb, that can wash away sin, and make the soul pure and clean in the sight of God: other blood stains; this is the only blood that makes the robes of the saints white and clean. 3. The blessedness to which they are now advanced, being thus prepared for it. 1st. They are happy in their station; for "they are before the throne of God night and day, and he dwells among them;" they are in that presence where there is fulness of joy. 2nd. They are happy in their employment, for they serve God continually, and that without weakness, drowsiness, or weariness. Heaven is a state of service, though not of suffering; it is a state of rest, but not of sloth; it is a praising, delightful rest. 3rd. They are happy in their freedom from all the inconveniences of this present life. First. From all want, and sense of want; they "hunger and thirst no more;" all their wants are supplied, and all the uneasiness caused thereby is removed. Secondly. From all sickness and pain; they shall never be scorched by the heat of the sun any more. 4th. They are happy in the love and conduct of the Lord Jesus; "He shall feed them, he shall lead them to living fountains of waters;" he shall put them into the possession of every thing that is pleasant and refreshing to their souls, and therefore "they shall hunger and thirst no more." 5th. They are happy in being delivered from all sorrow, or occasion of it; "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." They have formerly had their sorrows, and shed many tears, both upon the account of sin and affliction; but God himself, with his own gentle and gracious hand, will wipe those tears away, and they shall return no more for ever; and they would not have been without those tears when God comes to wipe them away. In this he deals with them as a tender father that finds his beloved child in tears; he comforts him, he wipes his eyes, and turns his sorrow into rejoicing. This should moderate the Christian's sorrow in his present state, and support him under all the troubles of it; for "they that sow in tears shall reap in joy; and they that now go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again rejoicing, bringing their sheaves with them."

[After these things, ver. 1, especially after such an event as the civil establishment of Christianity by Constantine, we expect to be instantly told of its universal reign. But instead thereof we find the four winds of the earth, which evidently signify, not, as Mr. Tong supposes, religious errors and corruptions, but tempests, symbolising civil ravages, and revolutions. The question very naturally arises, to use the words of Mr. Elliott, "Wherefore such a commission of wrath against the empire, after the glorious religious revolution just effected therein, and the triumph and establishment of Christianity?" To this question we reply in the words of Dr. Cumming, (Apocalyptic Sketches, containing a compendium of Mr. Elliott's work,) "The truth is, the church suffered more in the sunshine of the royal countenance than amid the blaze of burning faggots: the persecution of the heathen did not injure her so much as the patronage of the professing Christian. In the one case, she grasped her white robes more closely about her; in the other, and in unsuspecting moments, she let them go. Forgetting that this world was not her rest, she laid aside, in the intoxication of her visible prosperity, her diadem of beauty, her raiment of victory—parted with her eyesight, and put on the livery of Caesar, and ground at his mill a miserable drudge; and all the seeds of the apostacy, predicted in the Scriptures, and sown broadcast by Satan in the days of persecution, shot up under the imperial patronage into a disastrous and rapid harvest. After the adoption of Christianity by Constantine, the profession of the Gospel became fashionable—it was the religion of the court, the aristocracy, and the higher classes of society—its creed was no longer a loss, but a profit—the principles that once preceded their earnest advocates to prison, to the stake, and to the wild beasts, now paved the pathway to honour, office, and preferment. Christianity, in short, became a

vii. 14. "Sir, thou knowest:" Alford, following three out of the four oldest MSS., renders "My Lord." "Great tribulation:" the Greek has "the great tribulation." This is identified by some expositors with the persecution to which the martyrs were exposed under the fifth seal, and with the great tribulation predicted by our Lord (Matt. xxiv. 21).

vii. 17. "Feed them:" Alford has "tend them," a word which expresses more generally the shepherd's care. "Living fountains:"

qualification for office, a recommendation to Cæsar, a passport to honour. The catacombs, in which the early Christians had worshipped in silence and secrecy heretofore, and in which, as recorded by Dr. Maitland, they had left so many inscriptions that demonstrate the primitive character of Protestantism, were now exchanged for magnificent cathedrals; the tombs around which the persecuted clustered, as the only unmolested places on the earth in which they could worship the God that made it, were abandoned for temples towering to the skies; the earthen vessels used heretofore in the celebration of the communion were displaced by golden and silver chalices—ceremonies became outwardly splendid—the once lowly ministers of the cross became the companions of kings, and mitres, adorned with precious stones, covered those heads that were recently exposed to winds and rains, and all the elements of heaven. The baptismal font was surrounded with innumerable candidates, drawn to it rather by the prospect of temporal preferment than by attachment to Christian truth; and the visible church at length rose above the state, and dictated terms to the monarchs of the world, little remembering that such a height was real depression. What we call Puseyism in the nineteenth century was the predominating religion of the fourth. The first seed of the apostasy was the universal perversion of the sacrament of baptism, and the invention of new ceremonies in the celebration of it. In fact this beautiful initiatory ordinance had ceased to be what its Divine Author has constituted it, and instead, it had been caricatured into an amulet—an exorcism—a potent chemical drug, that served as an antidote to sin and a specific for regeneration. Milner, the historian, justly remarks of this period,—"There was much outward religion, but the true doctrine of justification was scarcely seen; real conversion was very much lost, and external baptism placed in its stead." (The same work is afterwards quoted with the letters A. S. subjoined.) Such was the state of wide-spread and fearful corruption to which Christianity was brought after its establishment by Constantine, in consequence of which the four winds of the earth were commissioned to go forth as they actually did, commencing at the period, and in the form, mentioned in the eighth chapter, when "the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound." But, in the meantime, a restraint was laid upon these four winds. "I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow," &c. Gibbon's language in reference to this period, as quoted by Mr. Elliott, is strikingly illustrative of the interpretation which is generally given to the first trumpets, as signifying the incursions and ravages of barbarous tribes: "The threatening tempest of barbarians," he says, "which so soon subverted the foundation of Roman greatness was still repelled or suspended on the frontiers." And why so? The angel, in ver. 2, "cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea, saying, Hurt not, till we have sealed the servants of our God." "Ere the angels could let loose their tempests, another and greater angel, described as having the seal of the life-giving God, appeared rising from the East; who, after charge to the destroyers to refrain till the sealing work was done, proceeded to seal a certain small but perfect number, one hundred and forty-four thousand; as an election, not out of the heathen world, but out of the mass of the professing Israel. Consequent on which there was added another evidently connected, and as evidently prospective or anticipative, vision, respecting the ultimate salvation and introduction into paradisaical blessedness of a certain palm-bearing company; depicted as a multitude innumerable, out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue, that had washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb: the which company, it was evident, was of the same class as "the sealed ones;" only made up, as would seem from its number, of their many successive generations, and gathered (in part at least) out of a world larger and more various in its population than the then world of vision. So the continuous preservation of this election of grace was foreshewn to the evangelist, through all the seductions of the apostasy within, and the desolating judgments from without, even to the final consummation,—it being further intimated, however, that they would be thus preserved to blessedness, only as saved ones out of a great—indeed the great tribulation; the same that had been predicted to the souls of the martyrs under the fifth seal, and which was to be greater even than that experienced by those martyrs themselves."—E.]

CHAPTER VIII.

We have already seen what occurred upon opening six of the seals: we now come to the opening of the seventh, which introduced the sounding of the seven trumpets; and a direful scene now opens. Most expositors agree the seven seals represent the interval between the apostle's time and the reign of Constantine; but the seven trumpets are designed to represent the rise of antichrist, some time after the empire became Christian. In this chapter we have, I. The preface or prelude to the sounding of the trumpets, ver. 1—6. II. The sounding of four of the trumpets, ver. 7 to the end.

AND when he had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour. 2 And I saw the seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven trumpets. 3 And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. 4 And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand. 5 And the angel took the censer, and filled it with fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth: and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake. 6 And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound.

In these verses we have the prelude to the sounding of the trumpets in several parts.

First. The opening of the last seal. This was to introduce a new set of prophetic iconisms and events; there is a continued chain of providence, one part linked to another; where one ends another begins; and though they may differ in nature and in time, they all make up one wise, well-connected, and uniform design in the hand of God.

Secondly. A profound silence in heaven for the space of half an hour; which may be understood either, 1. Of the silence of peace, that for this time no complaints were sent up to the ear of the Lord God of sabbath; all was quiet and well in the church, and therefore all silent in heaven; for whenever the church on earth cries through oppression, that cry comes up to heaven, and resounds there; or, 2. A silence of expectation. Great things were upon the wheel of providence, and the church of God, both in heaven and earth, stood silent, as became them, to see what God was doing, according to that of Zec. ii. 13, "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord, for he is risen up out of his holy habitation." And elsewhere, "Be still, and know that I am God."

Thirdly. The trumpets were delivered to the angels who were to sound them. Still the angels are employed as the wise and willing instruments of Divine providence, and they are furnished with all their materials and instructions from God our Saviour. As the angels of the churches are to sound the trumpet of the Gospel, the angels of heaven are to sound the trumpet of providence, and every one has his part given him.

Fourthly. To prepare for this, another angel must first offer incense, ver. 3. It is very probable this other angel is the Lord Jesus, the High Priest of the church, who is here described in his sacerdotal office, having a golden censer and much incense, a fulness of merit in his own glorious person; and this incense he was to offer up with the prayers of all the saints, upon the golden altar of his Divine nature. Observe, 1. All the saints are a praying people, none of the children of God are born dumb. A spirit of grace is always a spirit of adoption and supplication, "Teaching us to cry, Abba, Father." Ps. xxxii. 6. "For thus shall every one that is godly pray unto thee." 2. Times of danger should be praying times, and so should times of great expectation. Both our fears and our hopes should put us upon prayer; and where the interest of the church of God is deeply concerned, the hearts of the people of God in prayer should be greatly enlarged. 3. The prayers of the saints themselves stand in need of the incense and intercession of Christ to make them acceptable and effectual, and there is provision made by Christ for that purpose; he has his incense, his censer, and his altar; he is all himself to his people. 4. The prayers of the saints come up before God in a cloud of incense; no prayer thus recommended was ever denied audience and acceptance. 5. These prayers that were thus accepted in heaven produced great changes upon earth in return to them. The same angel that in his censer offered up the prayers of the saints, in the same "censer took of the fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth," and this presently caused strange commotions, "voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." These were the answers God gave to the prayers of his saints, and tokens of his anger against the world, and that he would do great things to avenge himself and his people of their enemies; and now, all things being thus prepared, the angels discharge their duty.

7 The first angel sounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth: and the third part of trees was burnt up, and all green grass was burnt up. 8 And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea: and the third part of the sea became blood; 9 And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died; and the third part of the ships were destroyed. 10 And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters; 11 And the name of the star is called Wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter. 12 And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise. 13 And I beheld, and heard an angel flying through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe, to the inhabitants of the earth by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels, which are yet to sound!

more full of teaching is the rendering, "unto the fountains of the waters of life, and God shall wipe away every tear from their eyes." There the redeemed will receive the supplies of Divine strength direct from the fountain source, just as they will no longer see through a glass darkly, but face to face.

viii 1. "Silence:" this silence has been differently understood. Some see in it merely "a solemn pause introductory to the fearful representations which were about to form the vision of the seventh seal." According to this view, we must regard the seven trumpet periods as contained within the seventh seal period. Others, however, view this silence as the Sabbath close of the seal periods. "After the six days' toil of the Church, the peace of the eternal Sabbath begins" (Wordsworth). According to this view, the seven seals, seven trumpets, seven vials, represent parallel periods, each closing with the consummation of all things, the rest of the faithful, and the judgment of the world.

Observe. First. The first angel sounded the first trumpet, and the events which followed were very dismal: "There followed hail and fire mingled with blood," &c., ver. 7. Here was a terrible storm; but whether it is to be understood of a storm of heresies, a mixture of monstrous errors falling on the church,—for in that age Arianism prevailed,—or a storm and tempest of war falling on the civil state, expositors are not agreed. Mr. Mede takes it to be meant of the Gothic inundation that broke in upon the empire in the year 395, and continued from A.D. 396 to A.D. 410, the same year that Theodosius died, when the northern nations, under Alaricus, king of the Goths, broke in upon the western parts of the empire. [Also the descent of Rhadagaisus, with his hosts of Vandals, Suevi, and Burgundians, who, as Gibbon says, "burst like a dark thunder-cloud on the Rhotian and Italian valleys."] However, here we observe, 1. That it was a very terrible storm; fire, and hail, and blood—a strange mixture. 2. The limitation of it. It fell on the third part of the trees, and on the third part of the grass, and blasted and burnt it up; that is, say some, upon the third part of the clergy, and the third part of the laity; or, as others who take it to fall upon the civil state, upon the third part of the great men, and upon the third part of the common people; either upon the Roman empire itself, which was a third part of the then known world, or upon a third part of that empire. [In the time of Constantine, the Roman empire was divided into three great sections: to Constantine was assigned Gaul, Spain, Britain, Italy, Africa; to Licinius, the Illyrian Prefecture; to Maximian, the Asiatic provinces and Egypt. Each section had its share of the Mediterranean, and its frontier river, the Rhine, the Danube, or the Euphrates. The four first trumpets apply to the western third of the empire.] The most severe calamities have their bounds and limits set them by the great God.

Secondly. The second angel sounded, and the alarm was followed, as in the first, with terrible events; "A great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea, and the third part of the sea became blood," ver. 8. By this mountain some understand the leader or leaders of the heretics; others, as Mr. Mede, the city of Rome, which was five times sacked by the Goths and Vandals, within the compass of one hundred and thirty-seven years; first by Alaricus, in the year 410, with great slaughter and cruelty. [Or rather, the Vandals under Genseric, who began in 429 to desolate Africa with burning and slaughter, and by means of his fleet ravaged the coast of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia.] In these calamities a third part of the people (called here the sea or collection of waters) were destroyed. Here was still a limitation to the third part; for "in the midst of judgment God remembers mercy." This storm fell heavy upon the maritime and merchandizing cities and countries of the Roman empire.

Thirdly. The third angel sounded, and the alarm had the like effects as before; "There fell a great star from heaven," &c., ver. 10. Some take this to be a political star, some eminent governor; and they apply it to Augustulus, who was forced to resign the empire to Odoacer, in the year 480. Others take it to be an ecclesiastical star, some eminent person in the church, compared to a burning lamp; and they fix it upon Pelagius, who proved about this time a falling star, and greatly corrupted the church of Christ.

[Rathor, Attila, king of the Huns, who, returning from his eastern wars in A.D. 450, crossed the Rhine as high as Basle, reducing to ashes Strasburg, Worms, Spire, Mentz, Treves. After having thus burned up the rivers, he pushed his victorious forces toward the mountains contiguous to the Alps. Pavia, Verona, Mantua, Milan, successively were embittered with wormwood, and were made to drink waters of gall, and were scorched and destroyed by the heat of this "great star, burning as a lamp." Suddenly, and apparently without cause, he returns, re-crosses the Danube, and is struck dead with apoplexy—the meteor, having done its work, was quenched, and its last lurid rays mingled with the expiring echoes of the third trumpet.—A. S.]

Observe. 1. Where this star fell: "Upon a third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters," ver. 10. 2. What effect it had upon them; it turned those springs and streams into wormwood, made them very bitter, that men were poisoned by them. Either the laws, that are springs of civil liberty, and property, and safety, were poisoned by arbitrary power; or the doctrines of the Gospel, the springs of spiritual life, refreshment, and vigour to the souls of men, were so corrupted and embittered, by a mixture of dangerous errors, that the souls of men found their ruin where they sought for their refreshment.

Fourthly. The fourth angel sounded, and the alarm was followed with further calamities. Observe. 1. The nature of this calamity; it was darkness; it fell, therefore, upon the great luminaries of the heaven that give light to the world,—the sun, and the moon, and the stars; either the guides and governors of the church, or of the state, who are placed in higher orbs than the people, and are to dispense light and benign influences to them. 2. The limitation; it was confined to a third part of these luminaries; there was some light both of the sun by day, and of the moon and stars by night, but it was only a part of what they had before. Without determining what is matter of controversy in these points among learned men, we rather choose to make these plain and practical remarks:

[The fourth trumpet sounds. The western empire has been desolated by land, by sea, and along its rivers—but its sun, and moon, and stars were still shining. Suddenly one third of each of these luminaries is darkened, and the whole firmament over that third is covered with blackness. How was this fulfilled? Thus, the Roman empire had lost its provinces, its maritime possessions, its armies and navies, and all the sinews of its strength—but it still retained the titles and insignia of sovereignty. It had the outward splendour without the solid foundations of a nation. One other blow, and only one, was required to be struck to complete the entire desolation of the western third—the work was to be done—the workman was at hand. Odoacer, one of the chiefs of Attila, starts suddenly into prominence—marches at the head of the Heruli into the very heart of Italy, and commands that the office of Roman emperor of the West shall be abolished, and the last shadow of departing sovereignty—Romulus Augustus,—a name that ominously embraced those of the founder and of the greatest ruler of the empire,—abdicated without an attempt at resistance; and the imperial insignia were transferred to Constantinople, and the emperor of the East exercised the sovereignty thenceforth. Thus one third of the imperial sun was extinguished, and, after senators and consuls had twinkled for a little, a night of darkness and unparalleled calamities fell upon the mistress of the earth—the queen of nations—the persecutor of the saints. Its foundations, righteousness and truth, perished, and it fell.—A. S. "I have now accomplished," says Gibbon, "the laborious narrative of the decline and fall of the Roman empire, from the fortunate age of Trajan and the Antonines to its utter extinction in the West, about five centuries after the Christian era. At that unhappy period the Saxons fiercely struggled with the natives for the possession of Britain. Gaul and Spain were divided between the powerful monarchies of the Franks and the Visigoths, and the dependent kingdoms of the Suevi and the Burgundians. Africa was exposed to the cruel persecution of the Vandals, and to the savage insults of the Moors. Rome and Italy, as far as the banks of the Danube, were afflicted by an array of barbarian mercenaries, whose lawless tyranny was succeeded by the reign of Theodoric, the Ostrogoth." (Supplementary Note on Daniel vii.) "All the subjects of the empire who, by the use of the Latin language, more particularly deserved, the names and privileges of Romans, were oppressed by the disgrace and calamities of foreign conquest; and the victorious nations of Germany established a new system of manners and government in the western countries of Europe."—After above a century and a half of calamities unexampled almost, as Dr. Robertson (chap. v., p. 11) most truly represents it in the history of nations, the statement of Jerome—a statement couched under the very apocalyptic figure of the text, but prematurely pronounced on the first taking of Rome by Alaric—might be considered as at length accomplished: Clarissimum terrarum lumen extinctum est,—"the world's glorious sun has been extinguished;" or, as the modern poet has expressed it, still under the same apocalyptic figure, "She saw her glories, star by star, expire," till not even one star remained to glimmer on the vacant and dark night.—E.]

1st. That where the Gospel comes to a people, and is but coldly received, and has not its proper effects upon their hearts and lives, it is usually followed with dreadful judgments. 2nd. God gives warning to men of his judgments before he sends them; he uses to sound an alarm by the written word, by ministers, by men's own consciences, and by the signs of the times; so that if a people be surprised, it is their own fault. 3rd. That the anger of God against a people makes dreadful work among them; it embitters all their comforts, and makes even life itself bitter and burdensome. 4th. That God does not in this world stir up all his wrath, but sets bounds to the most terrible judgments. 5th. That corruption of doctrine and worship in the church are themselves great judgments, and the usual causes and tokens of other judgments coming on a people.

Fifthly. Before the other three trumpets are sounded, here is a solemn warning given to the world, how terrible the calamities would be that should follow them, and how miserable those times and places would be on which they fell. 1. The messenger was "an angel flying in the midst of heaven," ver. 13, as in haste, and coming on an awful errand. 2. The message was a denunciation of further and greater woe and misery than the world had hitherto endured. Here are three woes, to shew how much the calamities coming should exceed those that had been already, or to hint how every one of the three succeeding trumpets should introduce its particular and distinct calamity. Observe, if lesser judgments do not take effect, but the church and the world grow worse under them, they must expect greater, and God will be known by the judgments that he executes; and he expects, when he comes to punish the world, the inhabitants thereof should tremble before him.

[The state of the bishops and priesthood, and church generally, alike in East and West, (for even as regarded antichrist the eastern patriarch was just as much prepared to enact the character as the western, could he have but accomplished it.) I say the ecclesiastical state, alike of East and West, was such as to call for the signal judgments of God. Already,—excepting the φύσος, the religious murders,—there was not a single one of the catalogue of sins enumerated under the sixth trumpet, as the cause of that woe and of the woe preceding, (ch. ix. 20, 21,) that had not, at the close of the sixth century, become markedly characteristic of the professed Christian church and clergy. There was the worship of demons, or saints canonized, and of images or idols of gold, silver, brass, stone, and wood, which could neither see, nor hear, nor walk; and there were the sorceries, or lying charms and miracles; and there were the fornications, and priestly religious thefts. And must not all these have seemed to an enlightened Christian to cry to Heaven for vengeance? Of the causes of coming woe against Judah and Jerusalem specified by the ancient prophets, and of those afterwards specified by Christ and his apostles, how few were there but now applied to corrupted Christendom! Isa. v. 1; xxx. 1; Eze. xiii. 3; Pr. vii. 13; Hab. ii. 19; Mat. xxiii. 13; Jude 11. Specially it was for its rejection, its determined rejection, of his own blessed gospel dispensation long offered it, that the Lord Jesus had finally denounced woe against Jerusalem—a denunciation of which that maniac prophet's cry, which Josephus describes to us, of "Woe, woe, woe to the city and the temple," was but the echo. And if woe was then boded against Jerusalem, how not, at this fearful crisis of its apostasy, against Roman Christendom also? Surely the very air must have seemed vocal to each thoughtful Christian, into which ascended the incense of its Christ-denying worship and blasphemies. And though to the West, perhaps, if his suspicion were right respecting antichrist, a temporary freedom from the woe might be allowed, in order to admit of antichrist's development and the fulfilment of Scripture prophecy, yet, sooner or later, the woe must be expected to embrace it: so that the forewarning cry, not unlike that or the apocalyptic angel in mid-heaven, would seem to sound aloud in his ears, "Woe, woe, woe, against all the inhabitants of the apostate Roman earth!"—E.]

CHAPTER IX.

In this chapter we have an account of the sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets, the appearances that attended them, and the events that were to follow. The fifth trumpet, ver. 1–12. The sixth, ver. 13 to the end.

AND the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. 2 And he opened the bottomless pit; and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. 3 And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth: and unto them was given power, as the scorpions of the earth have power. 4 And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads. 5 And to them it was given viii. 2. "Stood." Alford has the present tense, "which stand." Compare Luke i. 19: "I am Gabriel, which stand," &c. See also in the apocryphal Book of Tobit (chap. xii. 15): "I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels which present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the glory of the Holy One."

viii. 4. "Incense, which came with the prayers of the saints." The incense did not ascend with the prayers of the saints, but was mingled with them by the angel, as verse 3 shows. Alford's translation makes this clearer: "The smoke of the incense ascended up to the prayers of the saints out of the angel's hand before God. The prayers and the incense rose up, the one from the earth, the other from the golden altar in heaven, and, like two columns of smoke, blended together as they rose before God's throne."

viii. 7. "The third part of trees," &c.: another clause is introduced in all the best MSS.—"The third part of the earth was burnt up, and the third part of trees," &c.

that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months: and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man. 6 And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them. 7 And the shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle; and on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, and their faces were as the faces of men. 8 And they had hair as the hair of women, and their teeth were as the teeth of lions. 9 And they had breastplates, as it were breastplates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots of many horses running to battle. 10 And they had tails like unto scorpions, and there were stings in their tails: and their power was to hurt men five months. 11 And they had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon. 12 One woe is past; and, behold, there come two woes more hereafter.

Upon the sounding of this trumpet the things to be observed are, First. A star falling down from heaven to the earth. Some think this star represents some eminent bishop in the Christian church, some angel of the church; for, in the same way of speaking by which pastors are called stars, the church is called heaven; but who this is expositors do not agree. Some understand it of Boniface, the third bishop of Rome, who assumed the title of universal bishop, by the favour of the emperor Phocas, who, being a usurper and tyrant in the state, allowed Boniface to be so in the church as the reward of his flattery.

[The grandfather of Mahomet, and his lineal ancestors, says Gibbon, 'appeared in foreign and domestic transactions as the princes of their country.' They were, writes Mr. Elliott, 'in the view of the Syrian Greeks, as among the stars in the horizon of the political heaven. But just after his birth his father died, and very soon after his grandfather also, and the governorship of Mecca, headship of the tribe, and keys of the Caaba, passed into the hands of another branch of the family.' His prospects of greatness seemed all blasted by their deaths. He found himself, so he recounted his own history afterwards, a neglected and destitute orphan; though by birth a star in the horizon of the political firmament, he was now, at the opening of the seventh century, a star fallen to the ground, and must so have appeared to the Romans and Syrians, when, in the character of servant of the widow Cadijah, he came to traffic in the markets of Damascus.' It is in referring to this very period of his life that Mahomet observes, 'Cadijah believed in me when men despised me; she relieved my wants when I was poor and persecuted by the world.']

Secondly. To this fallen star was given the key of the bottomless pit. Having now ceased to be a minister of Christ, he becomes the antichrist, the minister of the devil; and by the permission of Christ, who had taken from him the keys of the church, he becomes the devil's turnkey, to let loose the powers of hell against the churches of Christ.

Thirdly. Upon the opening of the bottomless pit there arose a great smoke, which darkened the sun and the air. The devils are the powers of darkness, hell is the place of darkness. The devil carries on his designs by blinding the eyes of men, by extinguishing light and knowledge, and promoting ignorance and error; he first deceives men, and then destroys them; wretched souls follow him in the dark, or they durst not follow him.

[The very emblem of the key, here figured as given to Mahomet, might almost seem to have been selected in allusive contrast to its counterpart in the Koran. In the latter, the key of God is asserted to have been given to the prophet; that which was to open to believers the portals of the true religion and of heaven. Hence it was borne by his followers subsequently, at least by those of them who achieved the western conquests of Islam, even as the holy cross by Christians, as both a religious and a national emblem; and the sculpture on the proud gate of justice in the Moorish Alhambra still retains and exhibits this symbol. But the ix. 1. "Bottomless pit:" rather, "the pit of the abyss." "Bottomless pit" gives an erroneous idea; the true notion being that of an inner prison (pit) in the great depth (abyss), or, as Milton expresses it, 'in the lowest deep, a lower deep.'" (Webster and Wilkinson).

ix. 2. "Smoke . . . sun and air darkened:" some have interpreted this of the cloud of false doctrine (e.g., gnosticism) by which the light of the Gospel was obscured; others to the secret sources whence this and other errors proceeded.

apocalyptic vision more truly represented it as the key of the abyss, and the smoke which rose from the abyss on its opening it as the fumes and the pestilential darkness of hell. The Koran itself constantly refers to the key of God, which opened to Mahometans the gates of the world and of religion. 'Did not God,' it is written in the Koran, 'give to his legate the power of heaven which is above, and fire which is beneath? with the key did he not give him the title and power of a porter, that he may open to those whom he shall have chosen?' See wood engraving.]

Fourthly. Out of this dark smoke there came a swarm of locusts, one of the plagues of Egypt, the devil's emissaries headed by antichrist, all the rout and rabble of antichristian orders, to promote superstition, idolatry, error, and cruelty; and these had, by the just permission of God, power to hurt those that had not the mark of God in their foreheads.

[These symbols, as Mr. Elliott has shewn, are invariably to be explained on the principal of local, historical, or national allusion. This, in fact, is the key to all the symbols of Scripture. The fig-tree and the vine, for instance, are the emblems of Judah; the reed and the crocodile of Egypt; the willow denotes Babylon, the wild ass Ishmael, the eagle Edom, and the ship Tyre. It is by following out these precedents of interpreted symbols already set us in Scripture that we arrive at a consistent exposition of the symbols used in the Apocalypse. The composite character of the locust creature employed in the description of this woe, violating, as it does, all the facts of natural history, shews plainly that it is a symbol, and as such is to be explained. The locust symbol indicates that the invader of the guilty lands, marked out for punishment, would rush forward in countless swarms after the manner of locusts. The horse-like appearance denotes that the invading forces would consist mainly of hordes of cavalry. The lion-likeness intimates their daring and irresistible ferocity; and the scorpion sting, which does not kill the sufferer, indicates the torment they would inflict on those whom they would not be allowed to destroy. The locality from which they would come is plainly shewn to be the East. Thus, in Ex. x. 3, it is written, "The east wind brought the locusts" into Egypt from Arabia; and Volney, the sceptic historian, states that locusts come constantly from the deserts of Arabia. And, in Jud. vi. 5, the name Arbah for a locust is plainly associated with the name Arbi, an Arab, when it is stated that they, the Arabs, came as locusts for multitude. (See Supplementary Note on Joel ii. 20.) In this very century, A. D. 672, Mahometanism appeared in Arabia; that terrible smoke which darkens still so large and so beautiful a portion of the earth,—a system replete with fanaticism, fraud, sensualism, pride; which crushes wherever it conquers, and has extinguished the energy, the life, the freedom, of every country of which it has taken possession. And it was after embracing the tenets and imbibing the spirit of this false superstition that the Saracen hordes of cavalry issued in propagandist swarms with the fierceness of lions, and the fleetness of horses, and the stings of scorpions, upon guilty Christendom; they were resolved on victory or death; for, in the one case, they anticipated license upon earth; and, in the other, sensual indulgence as the reward of their exploits in heaven. 'The religion of Mahomet,' says Hallam, 'is essentially a military system; the people of Arabia found in the law of their prophet, not a license, but a command to desolate the world.' 'The Arabs or Saracens,' says Gibbon, 'had languished in poverty and contempt till Mahomet breathed into those savage hordes the soul of enthusiasm.' Schlegel, who was at once the philosopher and historian, in true apocalyptic terms, called Mahometanism 'the infernal spirit,' (smoke from the bottomless pit,) 'that produced that antichristian combination of spiritual and temporal authority.—A. S., whence also the remaining extracts in this chapter.]

Fifthly. The hurt they were to do them was not a bodily, but a spiritual hurt; they should not in a military way destroy all by fire and sword; the trees and the grass should be untouched, and those they hurt should not be slain; it should not be a persecution, but a secret poison and infection in their souls, which should rob them of their purity, and afterwards of their peace. Heresy is a poison in the soul, working slowly and secretly, but will be bitterness in the end. [It was also commanded them, we read, that "they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any tree." This was almost verbatim the commission given to the Saracens; for the caliph, in conformity with the prescription of the Koran, issued this order, 'Destroy no palm-trees, nor any fields of corn; cut down no fruit-trees.' And, in this respect, the conduct of the Saracens presented a favourable contrast to the practice of the Goths, who invariably destroyed every trace of vegetation, and left what was a garden in their van a desert in their rear.]

Sixthly. They had no power so much as to hurt those that had the seal of God in their foreheads; God's electing, effectual, distinguishing grace will preserve his people from total and final apostasy. [What remarkably identifies the symbol in the text with the people to whom we have applied it, is the commission to hurt "only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads." Mahomet himself told his followers that their mission was to execute judgment against the idolaters of the earth, and specially against the Christians of the Roman empire, who, by their worship of the Virgin Mary, even in the judgment of Mahomet, had become idolaters. Gibbon also states that the Christians of the seventh century had 'relapsed into the semblance of paganism, their public and private vows were addressed to images and relics that disgraced the temples of the earth, and the throne of the Almighty was darkened by a cloud of martyrs, saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration.' Thus the sceptic historian attests the apostate character of those the false prophet believed himself commissioned to punish.]

Seventhly. The power given to these factors for hell is limited in point of time—five months; a certain season, and but a short season, though how short we cannot tell. Gospel seasons have their limits, and times of seduction are limited too.

[They were to torment for five months; that is, one hundred and fifty prophetic days, or one hundred and fifty literal years. In 612 Mahomet first proclaimed his mission. This date was, therefore, the commencement of the Saracenic invasion. After Mahomet had thus appointed one to begin the terrible course of ruthless and inexorable proselytism, which imparted to that system its temporary success, and after conquests and occasional repulses, the dynasty of the Ommyiads was supplanted in the caliphate by the dynasty of Abassides, in 755; and the caliphate, heretofore so powerful, from its unity, was rent in twain, and the dynasty of the East became the antagonist of that of the West. Another capital, Medinat al Salem, or 'the city of peace,' farther eastward of Christendom, was selected, A. D. 762, and there the turbaned locusts settled. 'The colossus,' says Sismondi, 'that had bestridden the whole South, was broken; and this revolution did more for the deliverance of Europe from the Mussulman arms than even the battle of Poitiers.' 'War,' says Gibbon, 'was now no longer the passion of the Saracens—there the luxury of the caliphs relaxed the nerves, and terminated the progress of the Arabian empire.' From A. D. 612, the date of its rise, to A. D. 762, the date of its decay, is a period of one hundred and fifty years, or precisely the five prophetic months, or five times thirty prophetic days, that is, literal year, or the Apocalypse. These striking coincidences are surely not accidental. Gibbon had his mission, and that mission an important one. He is the reluctant commentator on the Apocalypse—

ix. 4. "Not hurt the grass:" showing the mystical character of these locusts—they would be restrained from injuring that which supplied them with their natural food (Exod. x. 15; Joel ii. 3).

ix. 6. "Desire to die:" the word expresses strong desire—"shall vehemently or eagerly desire to die."

ix. 10. "Tails like unto scorpions:" "Their tails were like that of the amphisbæna, which is said to have its tail shaped like a head, and to be able to sting with it."

the register of its prophecies fulfilled, the lasting evidence that God's word, which he denounced as false, is true.]

Eighthly. Though it would be short, it would be very sharp, inasmuch that those who were made to feel the malignity of this poison in their consciences would be weary of their lives; ver. 6, "A wounded spirit, who can bear?"

[In the year 629 the Saracens first issued from the desert; and in A.D. 636 they came down upon Damascus and Jerusalem like a resistless and overflowing torrent; and before A.D. 637 a Mahometan mosque was built upon the very site of the ancient temple of Solomon, and the cry of the Muezzim was heard where the voice of inspiration had been uttered before—the crescent waved victorious over Egypt, Spain, Persia, and India. In ten years, that is, from A.D. 634 to A.D. 644, the Saracens reduced three thousand and sixty cities, destroyed four thousand churches, and raised one thousand four hundred mosques; and, as if to shew how truly the punishment they inflicted "was as the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man," and that "in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it, and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them," the Christians they spared were tormented with the most cruel and protracted oppression,—their rites were mocked at, their worship degraded, their persons assailed, and insults, without ceasing, were heaped upon their churches; and the common language addressed to them was, 'Ye Christian dogs, ye know your option—the Koran, the tribute, or the sword!']

Ninthly. These lucusts were of a monstrous size and shape, ver. 7, 8, &c. They were equipped for their work like horses prepared to battle. 1. They pretended to great authority, and seemed to be assured of victory. They had crowns like gold on their heads; it was not a true, but a counterfeit authority. 2. They had the show of wisdom and sagacity, the faces of men, though the spirit of devils. 3. They had all the allurements of seeming beauty to ensnare and defile the minds of men, hair like women; their way of worship was very gaudy and ornamental. [They are represented to have 'faces as men,' 'the long hair of women,' 'breastplates,' and 'crowns' adorned with gold upon their heads; that is, the courage and the aspect of the man, the effeminacy of the woman, invulnerability in battle, and continuous victory. Pliny describes the Arabs as wearing the moustache on the upper lip, having long hair and crowns, or turbans, on their heads. In the Antar, an Arabic poem, belonging to the age which we are now describing, we have frequent mention of the long hair of the Arabs streaming from beneath their turbans.] 4. Though they appeared with the tenderness of women, they had the teeth of lions, were really cruel creatures. 5. They had the defence and protection of earthly powers, 'breastplates of iron.' 6. They made a mighty noise in the world; they flew about from one country to another, and the noise of their motion was like that of an army with chariots and horses. 7. Though at first they soothed and flattered men with a fair appearance, their was a sting in their tails; the cup of their abominations contained that which, though luscious at first, would at length bite as a serpent, and sting like an adder. 8. The king and commander of this hellish squadron is here described, 1st. As an angel; so he was by nature an angel, once one of the angels of heaven. 2nd. The angel of the bottomless pit; an angel still, but a fallen angel, fallen into a bottomless pit, vastly large, and out of which there is no recovery. 3rd. In these infernal regions he is a sort of prince and governor, and has the powers of darkness under his rule and command. 4th. That his true name is Abaddon, Apollyon, 'a destroyer,' for that is his business, his design, and employment, to which he diligently attends, in which he is very successful, and takes a horrid, hellish pleasure. It is about this destroying work that he sends out his emissaries and armies to destroy the souls of men. And now here we have the end of one woe; and where one ends another begins.

13 And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God, 14 Saying to the sixth angel which had the trumpet, Loose the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates. 15 And the four angels were loosed, which were prepared for an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year, for to slay the third part of men. 16 And the number of the army of the horsemen were two hundred thousand thousand: and I heard the number of them. 17 And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire, and of jacinth, and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions; and out of their mouths issued fire and smoke and brimstone. 18 By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths. 19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt. 20 And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood: which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk: 21 Neither repented they of their murders, nor of their sorceries nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts.

Here let us consider the preface to this vision, and then the vision itself.

First. The preface to this vision, ver. 13, 14. A voice was heard from the horns of the golden altar; where observe, 1. That the power of the church's enemies is restrained till God gives the word to have them turned loose. 2. That when nations are ripe for punishment, those instruments of God's anger that were before restrained are now let loose upon them, ver. 14. 3. The instruments that God makes use of to punish a people may sometimes lie at a great distance from them, so as that no danger may be apprehended from them. These four messengers of Divine judgment lay bound in the river Euphrates, a great way from the European nations. Here the Turkish power had its rise, which seems to be the story of this vision.

Secondly. The vision itself, ver. 15, 16. And the four angels that had been bound in the great river Euphrates were now loosed. And here observe,

[1. These four angels are referred to in ch. vii. as the tempest-restraining angels. The judgments which they were commissioned to execute had been going on under the previous symbols. But at Bagdad, on the Euphrates, these ceased, for there the Saracenic empire was rent in twain, and the conquests of the Moors ceased; and there, consequently, the angels paused in their dread work, and were bound. A commission was given to those four angels to arise from this spot where they were bound, and to let loose a new judgment—that of the Turks. Togrul Beg was declared to be head of the Turkish empire, and the protector and governor of Mecca. He forthwith declared war against Christendom—in other words, the instant the sixth trumpet sounded the four angels were let loose, and judgments immediately followed. The Turks, we are told, invaded Christendom, and commenced a war against it, under Alp Arslan, called 'the valiant lion.' He crossed the Euphrates in the year 1063, at the head of immense masses of Turkish cavalry. He carried victory in his van, and havoc and destruction in his rear. Hence, at the end of the fourteenth century, after the crusades and all their glory had passed away, we read that the Turks again crossed the Danube, and fell on Constantinople; and Gibbon, the historian, makes the remark, that, for the first time in the history of Europe, 'Constantinople was surrounded both on the Asiatic and European side,' by the forces of the Turks, led by the Sultan Hunkiar, whose name in the Turkish language is, literally, 'the slayer of men;' as if to describe his mission to be "to slay the third part of men," as it is declared and defined in the Apocalypse.]

2. The time of their military operations and executions is limited to "an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year." Prophetic characters of time are hardly to be understood by us; but in general, the time is fixed to an hour, when it shall begin, and when it shall end; and how far the execution shall prevail, even to a third part of the inhabitants of the earth. God will make the wrath of man praise him, and the remainder of wrath he will restrain.

[A prophetic year may be taken at three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter prophetic days, or literal years. The prophetic month is thirty prophetic days, or thirty literal years; a prophetic day is one literal year. (See Supplementary Note on Dan. vii.) And thus a day in the Apocalypse means a year; a year signifies three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter such prophetic days, or literal years. And, using this explanation, the hour, the day, the month, and the year, are thus exactly met; and, within a day, describe the period which extends from the time when the Turkish forces left Bagdad on the Euphrates, till the time that Constantinople fell, and all the grandeur of the East set in gloom and darkness, which has not yet been dissipated. We find three hundred and sixty-five and a quarter years—a month or thirty years—a day or one year—an hour or fifteen days, make three hundred and ninety-six years and one hundred and six days. Now the time when the Turks left Bagdad was A.D. 1075; the time when Constantinople fell under their arms was A.D. 1453; the former period commencing January 18, and the latter period ending on May the 29th, that is, three hundred and ninety-six years and one hundred and six days; the dates thus recorded in history correspond precisely with the prophetic period specified in the Apocalypse. And it is thus more decisive evidence that our identification of the sixth trumpet with the Turkish invasion and the fall of Constantinople is a great and all but indubitable fact.]

3. The army that was to execute this great commission is mustered, and the number found to be of horsemen "two hundred thousand thousand," [Myriads of myriads; a numeral phrase, indefinite. Gibbon speaks of 'the myriads of the Turkish horse overspreading the Greek frontier from the Taurus to Erzeroum;' or of the cavalry of the earlier Turks of mount Altai, 'being, both men and horses, proudly computed by millions;'] but we are left to guess what the infantry must be. In general it tells us, the armies of the Mahometan empire should be vastly great; and so it is certain they were. 4. Their formidable equipage and appearance, ver. 17. As the horses were fierce like lions, and eager to rush into the battle, so they that sat upon them were clad in bright and costly armour, with all the ensigns of martial courage, zeal, and resolution. 5. The vast havoc and desolation that they made in the Roman empire, which was now become antichristian; a third part of them were killed;

TURKISH STANDARD.

ix. 13. "From the four horns:" it is uncertain whether the words "four horns" should stand as part of the text. The Sinaitic MS. omits the words "the four horns," and reads, "I heard the voice of the golden altar." The sense, however, remains, that the apostle heard a voice sounding from the altar.

ix. 14. "In the great river:" this should be "on or at the great river Euphrates." Wordsworth understands this figuratively, just as Babylon is used figuratively. He interprets the four angels of the fourfold gospel, which in a sense has been bound at the great river Euphrates—the mystical Babylon, the Church of Rome—for that great city has put fetters on the word of God. The structure of the vision, however, seems to suggest the visitation of some judgment.

ix. 17. "Breastplates of fire:" Alford renders, "Breastplates red as fire, and blue as smoke, and yellow as brimstone."

ix. 18. "By these three," &c.: the oldest MSS. have, "By these they went as far as their commission suffered them, and they could go no farther. 6. Their artillery, by which they made such slaughter, described by fire, smoke, and brimstone, issuing out of the mouths of their horses, and the stings that were in their tails. It is Mr. Mede's opinion that this is a prediction of great guns, those instruments of cruelty which make such destruction; and observes, These were first used by the Turks at the siege of Constantinople, and being new and strange, were very terrible, and did great execution.

[We read that in the siege of Constantinople, the last stronghold of apostate Christendom, the fall of which was the most dreadful calamity to the East, as the fall of Rome was the most disastrous to the West, new elements of destruction were recently introduced in war—that gunpowder and cannon were employed; and it was only by their instrumentality that this illustrious city was reduced to ruins. The sultan, on this occasion, hearing that a foundry of cannon had deserted from the enemy, put the question to him, "Canst thou found a cannon large enough to batter down the walls of Constantinople?"—and in the course of a few months a whole park of artillery were pouring death and destruction on the devoted walls of that illustrious eastern capital. And so much did this fact strike Gibbon, that he states, in his history of the siege of Constantinople—after giving an account of that mysterious mixture of saltpetre, sulphur, and charcoal—that "fortifications, that had stood for ages against the Goth, the Hun, the Vandal, and the Saracen, now fell before the mighty power of cannon." Constantinople fell amid the groans of the Christian and the shouts of the Moslem, and the empire of the East set never again to rise. "For their power is in their tails; for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them do they hurt," ver. 19. The same expression is used of the Saracens, who embraced the same religion—namely, Mahometanism, that their power (ἐξουσία, "jurisdiction," "authority") was in their tails. It is recorded in history that one of the Turkish chiefs had lost his standard in the battle, and that on discovering his loss he cut off the tail of the horse on which he rode, mounted it on a pole, and announced to the Turks that it was to be the standard of their nation, and round it thenceforth they rallied to the havoc and to victory. From that moment the horse's tail became the most distinctive official symbol of the Turks; so much so, that at the present day it is the very word for honour and power: the number of tails a Turk has is the expression of the amount of official power to which he is raised. A pasha of one tail is of the lowest rank—of two tails higher—and a pasha of three tails is a still higher rank. The fact fulfils (seems to fulfil) the prophecy.—A. S. See wood engraving.]

However, here seems to be an allusion to what is mentioned in the former vision, that as antichrist had his forces of a spiritual nature, like scorpions poisoning the minds of men with error and idolatry, so the Turks, that were raised up to punish the antichristian apostacy, had their scorpions and their stings too, to hurt and kill their bodies, who had been the murderers of so many souls. 7. Observe the impenitency of the antichristian generation under these dreadful judgments, ver. 20; the rest of the men that were not killed repented not, they still persisted in those sins for which God was so severely punishing them, which were, 1st. Their idolatry. They would not cast away their images, though they could do them no good, could "neither see, nor hear, nor walk." 2nd. Their murders, ver. 21, which they had committed upon the saints and servants of Christ. Popery is a bloody religion, and seems resolved to continue so. 3rd. Their sorceries. They have their charms and magic arts, and rites in exorcism and other things. 4th. Their fornications. They allow both spiritual and carnal impurity, and promote it in themselves and others. 5th. Their thefts. They have by unjust means heaped together a vast deal of wealth to the injury and impoverishing of families, cities, princes, and nations. These are the flagrant crimes of antichrist and his agents; and though God has revealed his wrath from heaven against them, they are obstinate, hardened, and impenitent, and judiciously so, for they must be destroyed. From this sixth trumpet learn, First. That God can make one enemy of the church to be a scourge and plague to another. Secondly. That he who is the Lord of hosts, has vast armies at his command to serve his own purposes. Thirdly. That the most formidable powers have limits set them, which they cannot transgress. Fourthly. That when God's judgments are in the earth, he expects the inhabitants thereof should "repent of sin and learn righteousness." Fifthly. That impenitency under Divine judgments is an iniquity that will be the ruin of sinners; for where God judges he will overcome.

CHAPTER X.

This chapter is an introduction to the latter part of the prophecies of this book. Whether what is contained between this and the sounding of the seventh trumpet, in ch. xi. 15, be a distinct prophecy from the other, or only a more general account of some of the principal things included in the other, is disputed by our curious inquiries into these abstruse writings. However, here we have, I. A remarkable description of a very glorious angel with an open book in his hand, ver. 1—3. II. An account of seven thunders which the apostle heard, as echoing to the voice of this angel, and communicating some discoveries, which the apostle was not yet allowed to write, ver. 4. III. The solemn oath taken by him who had the book in his hand, ver. 5—7. IV. The charge given to the apostle, and observed by him, ver. 8—11.

AND I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud: and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire: 2 And he had in his hand a little book open: and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth, 3 And cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth: and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices. 4 And when the seven thunders had uttered their voices, I was about to write: and I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Seal up three plagues were the third part," &c. This reading seems against Wordsworth's interpretation.

x. 1. "Rainbow;" not "a rainbow," but "the rainbow." The definite article (found in the best MSS.) seems to throw back our attention to the vision in chap. iv. 3; the emblem of Divine justice and mercy rested upon him who is the angel of the covenant.

x. 2. "Little book:" this is interpreted by Wordsworth of the completion of the canon of Scripture. "This vision is intended to those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not. 5 And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, 6 And swore by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer: 7 But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets.

Here we have an account of another vision the apostle was favoured with, between the sounding of the sixth trumpet and that of the seventh. And we observe,

First. The person that was principally concerned in communicating this discovery to John; an angel from heaven, "another mighty angel;" who is so set forth as would induce one to think it could be no other than our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. [1. Power is the attribute by which this angel is mainly characterized. He is the Mighty One; as God, he laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the workmanship of his hand: as Mediator, he sits on the right hand of power in the heavens, and has all power in heaven and earth committed to him. How many displays has he given of his great power in the ancient days, in the generation of old. But, among all the past acts which have marked the course of his administration, there is not one equal to that which he reserved for the last.—S. V., whence also remaining extracts on this chapter.] 2. He was "clothed with a cloud;" he veils his glory, which is too great for mortality to behold; and he throws a veil upon his dispensations: "Clouds and darkness are round about him." 3. "A rainbow was upon his head;" he is always mindful of his covenant: and when his conduct is most mysterious, yet it is perfectly just and faithful. 4. His face was as the sun, all bright and full of lustre and majesty," ch. i. 16. 5. His feet were as pillars of brass; all his ways, both of grace and providence, are pure and steady.

Secondly. His station and posture; "He set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot upon the earth;" to shew the absolute power and dominion he hath over the whole world. "And he held in his hand a little book open;" probably the same that was before sealed, but was now opened, and gradually fulfilled by him.

[We are persuaded that the opinion held concerning the little book by Mede, in which he was followed by Vitranga and Sir Isaac Newton, and others, is the sound one. It is represented with great propriety as "a little book," because the space of time comprehended in it is much shorter than that included in the other. We have already said, that when the western empire was destroyed at the sounding of the fourth trumpet, the scene of judgment was transferred to the eastern world. The fifth trumpet, or first woe trumpet, was sounded, introducing the plague of the locusts, or Saracens. The sixth trumpet, or second woe trumpet, was next sounded, introducing the plague of the horse-men, or Turks, by whom the eastern empire was destroyed. But during the infliction of these woes in the East, popery was gradually rising in the West. On it the third woe was now to be inflicted; therefore it was necessary to retrograde in the symbolic narrative, in order to bring up the history of affairs in the West from the time the western empire had been overthrown. This the little book does. It exhibits the rise of antichrist, and his gradual ascent to universal dominion. Once again, and a third time, are we told the story of that eventful period: first, in the witnesses who prophesy in sackcloth, are slain, and obliged to flee into the wilderness; and yet again, in the history of the beast of the sea and the beast of the earth; which last grew to such a height of power, and waxed so self-willed and imperious, that he would permit no one to buy or sell who did not wear his mark in his forehead or in his right hand. Thus the prophecy is thrice given, and each time under different imagery; because God had established the thing, and would surely bring it to pass; and also, that opportunity might be given minutely to paint antichrist in his character and actions, in order that the church might know him when he appeared. Such, then, is the subject of the little book. It supplies the history of some most important events which took place during the sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets,—that is, from the close of the fifth to the beginning of the sixteenth century,—and the knowledge of which is essential to the right understanding of the closing acts in the great apocalyptic drama.]

Thirdly. His awful voice. He cried aloud, "as when a lion roareth," ver. 3. And his awful voice was echoed by "seven thunders," seven solemn and terrible ways of discovering the mind of God.

[The angel speaks with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth; and the seven thunders are the re-echo of the angel's voice. Similar in character to the original sound must be the reverberations. The voice denoted the awful events of the coming dispensation, especially those that were to bring about "the consummation;" and so must the seven thunders which were awakened by that voice. They relate, we are strongly persuaded, to the plagues that were to constitute the third woe,—the judgments by which the ruin of the papacy was to be accomplished. If so, they are the same as the plagues of the seven vials, with which they correspond in point of number; and the words of the angel that follow give ground to conclude that they correspond with the vials in point of time also; that, in fact, both relate to the same events.]

Fourthly. The prohibition given to the apostle, that he should not publish, but conceal what he had learned from the seven thunders, ver. 4. The apostle was for preserving and publishing every thing he saw and heard in these visions, but the time was not yet come. [Why was it said to John, "Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not?" Obviously because the events they announced were to be afterwards revealed to him in symbol under the seventh trumpet. They were sealed up now, because John had first to be shewn the rise and reign of that terrible power on which the plagues which the thunders announced were to be inflicted. It would have violated the proprieties of the apocalyptic drama to write the doom before the object of that doom had arisen.]

Fifthly. The solemn oath taken by this mighty angel. 1. The manner of his swearing; he "lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by him that liveth give Divine sanction to that important act." Others take it as indicating the supplementary prophecy which gives a fuller account of the growth of Christianity.

x. 6. "There should be time no longer;" rather, "there shall be delay no longer." The connection with verse 7 then becomes clearer. There should be delay no longer, but when the seventh angel was about to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, according to the glad tidings declared.

for ever;" by himself, as God often has done; or by God as God, to whom he, as Lord, Redeemer, and Ruler of the world now, now appeals. 2. The matter of the oath: "That there should be time no longer;" either, 1st. That there shall be now no longer delay in fulfilling the predictions of this book than till the last angel shall sound, then every thing should be put into speedy execution, "the mystery of God shall be finished," ver. 7. Or, 2nd. That when this mystery of God is finished, time itself shall be no more; as is the measure of things that are in a mutable, changing state; but all things shall be at length for ever fixed, and so time itself swallowed up in eternity.

[Every one qualified to consult the original will at once admit that our translation does not give the precise import of the angel's oath,—χρόνος οὐκ ἔσται, literally, "The time shall not be yet." The angel refers plainly to the time when some event, important in itself, and anxiously desired and expected by John, as representative of the church, should happen, and of which the angel had just spoken, and been answered by the thunders which had disclosed the particulars of that great event. When, then, shall it be? "But," continues the angel, "in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets." That it was some joyful event, to the church at least, whatever its aspect to the world, is undoubted, from the term which the angel employs when speaking about it,—εὐγγελισαί,—the same word which is employed to denote the preaching of the gospel. It had been declared as good news. We learn farther from the angel's oath, that the event had ere now been foretold. It had been declared,—preached as good news,—to the prophets. To which of the prophets? Is there any of them to whom we find a revelation made,—a revelation on oath,—of the consummation, or the finishing of some grand epoch in God's government of the world? We find such a revelation made to Daniel, conveyed in terms and accompanied with imagery so very nearly identical with those of the vision before us, that we can have no doubt the allusion is to that prophet: see Dan. xii. 6, 7. The epoch, which was to bear a complex character, in as much as it was to be a period of unexampled trouble, and of deliverance equally unexampled, was then far distant: accordingly, Daniel was told, "the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end." The vision of Daniel helps us to interpret that of John. In the above passage there is a reference made to a noted period in the Apocalypse,—"a time, times, and a half," that is, a year, two years, and half a year, that is, twelve hundred and sixty prophetic days, or years. The period, we say, is a strongly marked one in the Apocalypse, seeing it embraces the reign of antichrist. At the end of that period all these wonders of judgment and deliverance are to happen. This enables us to determine what is here meant by the mystery of God, which shall be finished in the days of the voice of the seventh angel. It also goes a great way to determine with certainty what the things were which the seven thunders uttered, but which John was forbidden to write. Seeing we are informed in Daniel that they were to take place at the close of the twelve hundred and sixty days, we infer that they were the seven last plagues, by which antichrist was to be slowly consumed, and at length suddenly and fearfully destroyed. The history of "the little book" begins after the sounding of the fourth trumpet; from which period, speaking generally, we date the rise of antichrist. The oath of the angel, touching the finishing of the mystery of God in his destruction, bore that it should not be yet. A full millennium had to intervene,—from the fifth to the sixteenth century; not sooner should antichrist reach his meridian. But, having attained the height of his power, the seventh angel should sound; and then, as sure as God possessed almighty power and eternal being, antichrist should be destroyed.]

8 And the voice which I heard from heaven spake unto me again, and said, Go and take the little book which is open in the hand of the angel which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth. 9 And I went unto the angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, Take it, and eat it up; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey. 10 And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter. 11 And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.

Here we have,

First. A strict charge given to the apostle, which was, 1. That he should "go and take the little book" out of the hands of that mighty angel mentioned before. This charge was given, not by the angel himself that stood upon the earth, but by the same voice from heaven that, in the fourth verse, had laid an injunction upon him not to write what he had discerned by the seven thunders. 2. To eat the book. This part of the charge was given by the angel himself, hinting to the apostle that before he should publish what he had discovered, he must more thoroughly digest the predictions, and be in himself suitably affected with them.

Secondly. An account of the taste and relish which this little book would have when the apostle had taken it in. 1. While "in his mouth, sweet." All persons feel a pleasure in looking into future events, and in having them foretold; and all good men love to receive a word from God, of what import soever it be. But, 2. When this book of prophecy was more thoroughly digested by the apostle the contents would be bitter. These were things so awful and terrible, such grievous persecutions of the people of God, and such desolation made in the earth, that the foresight and foreknowledge of them would not be pleasant, but painful to the mind of the apostle. Thus was Ezekiel's prophecy to him, Eze. iii. 3.

Thirdly. The apostle's discharge of the duty he was called to; ver. 10, he "took the little book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up," and he found the relish to be as was told him. 1. It becomes the servants of God to digest in their own souls the messages they bring to others in his name, and to be suitably affected with it themselves. 2. It becomes them to deliver every message with which they are charged, whether it would be pleasing or displeasing to men. That which is least pleasing may be most profitable; however, God's messengers must not keep back any part of the counsel of God.

now taken in, was not given him merely to gratify his own curiosity, or to affect him with pleasure or pain, but to be communicated by him to the world. Here his prophetic commission seems to be renewed, and he is ordered to prepare for another embassy, to convey those declarations of the mind and will of God, which are of great importance, to all the world, and to the highest and greatest men in the world, and such should be read and recorded in many languages; and so it is: we have them in our language, and are all obliged to attend unto them, and humbly to inquire into the meaning of them, and firmly to believe that every thing shall have its accomplishment in the proper time; and when the prophecies are fulfilled, the sense and truth of them will appear, and the omniscience, power, and faithfulness of the great God will be adored.

[The vision ends with an intimation to John to receive the book from the angel, and eat it. He did so: "And it was in my mouth sweet as honey; and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter." To eat the book denoted the exercise of his mind respecting it. To understand a matter at once important and profound is pleasant,—sweet as honey; but, alas! the book contained heavy tidings to the church: it announced a period of twelve hundred and sixty years of sorrow to her, and of triumph to her foes: "And as soon as I had eaten (understood) it, my belly was bitter." Once more was the voice of prophecy to be heard in the world before it should become silent for ever. "Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings." John was the last of the prophets, and this was the last prophecy. It respected the church's last enemy; and as soon as this prediction should be published, the volume of prophecy would be closed. John was not in person to publish these sayings to the world. He was a prisoner in Patmos, kept there by the tyrant who now governed the world. But though he had been permitted that very day to leave the shores of the lonely isle, he was too full of years and sufferings to journey through the countries, and proclaim what was now made known to him. He was soon, by death, to rejoin in glory that Lord whose chosen and best beloved companion he had been during his humiliation on earth. But, being inspired to write the visions of Patmos, he is prophesying to this hour before peoples and nations. And by the church he has ever been held to be one of the greatest of those prophets which, though dead, yet speak unto her.]

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter we have an account, 1. Of the measuring-reed given to the apostle to take the dimensions of the temple, ver. 1, 2. 11. Of the two witnesses of God, ver. 3—13. 111. Of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and what followed upon it, ver. 14 to the end.

And there was given me a reed like unto a rod. and the angel stood, saying, Rise, and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein. 2 But the court which is without the temple leave out, and measure it not; for it is given unto the Gentiles: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two month.

This prophetic passage about measuring the temple is a plain reference to what we find in Ezekiel's vision, Eze. xl. 3; but how to understand either the one or the other is not so easy. It should seem the design of measuring the temple in the former case was in order to the rebuilding of it, and that with advantage. The design of this measure seems to be either, 1. For the preservation of it in those times of public danger and calamity that are here foretold; or, 2. For its trial, that it may be seen how far it agrees with the standard or pattern in the mount. Or, 3. For its reformation; that what is redundant, deficient, or changed, may be regulated according to the true model. Observe, First. How much was to be measured. 1. The temple. The gospel church in general, whether it be so built, so constituted, as the gospel rule directs; whether it be too narrow or too large,—the door too wide or too strait. 2. The altar. That which was the place of the most solemn acts of worship may be put for religious worship in general; whether the church has the true altar, both as to substance and situation; as to substance, whether they take Christ for their altar, and lay down all their offerings there; and in situation, whether the altar be in the holiest, that is, whether they worship God in the Spirit and in truth. 3. The worshippers too must be measured, whether they make God's glory their end and his word their rule, in all their acts of worship; and whether they come to God with suitable affections, and whether their conversation be as becomes the Gospel.

Secondly. What was not to be measured, ver. 2, and why it should be left out. 1. What was not to be measured; "The court which is without the temple, measure it not." Some say Herod, in the additions made to the temple, built an outer court, and called it, 'the court of the Gentiles.' Some tell us Adrian built the city and an outer court, and called it, Ælia, and gave it to the Gentiles. 2. Why was not the outer court mentioned? This was no part of the temple, according to the model either of Solomon or Zerubbabel, and therefore God would have no regard to it. He would not mark it out for preservation, but as it was designed for the Gentiles, to bring pagan ceremonies and customs, and to annex them to the gospel churches, so Christ abandoned it to them, to be used as they pleased; and both that and the city were trodden under foot for a certain time, "forty and two months," which some will have to be the whole time of the reign of antichrist. They that worship in the outer court are either such as worship in a false manner, or with hypocritical hearts; and these are rejected of God, and will be found among his enemies. From the whole observe, 1st. God will have a temple and an altar in the world till the end of time. 2nd. That he has a strict regard to this temple, and observes how every thing is managed in it. 3rd. Those that worship in the outer court will be rejected, and only those that worship within the veil accepted. 4th. "The holy city," the visible church, is very much trampled upon in the world. But, 5th. The desolations of the church are for a limited time, and for a short time; and she shall be delivered out of all her troubles.

[The author of Horæ Apocalyptice makes the symbol of the rod to carry the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical; and on the symbol so interpreted

x. 11. "He said:" the best MSS. have "they say unto me." This eating of the book is considered by some to mark, as in Ezekiel's case (Ezek. iii. 1—3), the inauguration of the apostle to a fresh stage in his prophetic office.

xi. 1. "Reed like unto a rod:" compare Ezek. xl. 3 and Rev. xxi. 15. Some refer this to the canon and rule of Holy Scripture, completed by St. John. The reed was like to a rod. There seems to be an allusion to the rod of iron (Psa. ii. 9), which cannot be bent or broken, but which will break in pieces all opposing forces. "And the angel stood:" these words are omitted in the best MSS. The word "saying" is thus made to agree with "reed." The reed, or canon of Holy Scripture, the measuring reed of the Church, the rule of faith, speaks the word of command, and is itself the measure. Compare chap. xvi. 7, where, according to the best MSS., the altar is represented as speaking.

xi. 2. "Forty and two months:" i.e., the three years and a half, he founds the grave inference that the royal supremacy is lawful, and tenders an admonition to those who impugn it. 'The apocalyptic prophecy,' he says, 'seems to have pronounced distinctly against them, representing, as it does, the original constitution of the Lutheran and Anglican reformed churches on that very principle,—not as any act of sinful Erastianism, but as Christ's own doing, and so with the stamp of his approbation on it.' Dr. Candlish, in his Four Letters, and the author of the Seventh Vial, discuss this opinion. Bishop Warburton, in one of his Letters to Bishop Hurd (1809; p. 192), makes the following observations, which may be useful in reference to it: 'I greatly approve of your design of a dialogue on the effect of transferring supremacy in religious matters. A thousand curious hints will arise to you as you proceed in contemplation of the subject. One now, for instance, occurs to me: Could any thing be more absurd than that, when the yoke of Rome was thrown off, they should govern the new church, erected in opposition to it, by the laws of the old? The pretence was, that this was only by way of interim, till a body of ecclesiastical laws could be formed. But whoever considers that the canon laws proceeded from, and had perpetual reference to, an absolute spiritual monarch, and were formed upon the genius, and did acknowledge the authority, of the civil laws, the issue of civil despotism,—I say, whoever considers this will be inclined to think that the crown contrived this interim from the use the canon law was of to the extension of the prerogative. However, it is certain that the succeeding monarchs, Elizabeth, James, and Charles, prevented our ever having a body of new ecclesiastical laws from a sense of this utility in the old ones, and a consciousness if ever they submitted a body of new laws to the legislature, the parliament would form them altogether upon the genius of a free church and state.' 'The interior temple,' says Vitrinæ, 'means true Christians; the exterior, false Christians, heretics, &c.; the altar means Christ; measuring the temple and worshippers is scrutinizing the character of Christians, real or professed; the casting out of the outer court is excommunicating false professors; the heathen who are to tread down the temple and city are Christians in name only, (and therefore called heathen), who are to form an external church, and have dominion over it,—suppressing at the same time the true worshippers of God, until at last God shall exclude them from even the external pale of his church.' 'What could be the use,' justly asks Mr. Elliott, 'of resembling the measuring reed to a simple stick, or staff?' 'But let it be resembled,' says Dr. Candlish, 'to the rod of sovereignty and judgment in the hand of Christ, the Lord; and how appropriate—how significant—is the similitude! The temple is to be measured; a holy and peculiar people are to be separated, and kept separate, from the heathenism of professing Christendom. For this end a spiritual ministry is ordained; and, in addition to the commission of preaching, there is given to that ministry authority to draw the line—to mark out the character and limits of the altar-court and its worshippers—to make a distinction between the select company who adhere to the one righteousness and the one sacrifice through which alone worship can be acceptable, and the miscellaneous crowd who more or less conform to popery and formality. And, as the emblem or symbol of this authority, a measuring reed is given; a measuring reed, bearing a resemblance to a rod, or sceptre. What rod? What sceptre? Would any of those to whom the revelation was first addressed hesitate for a moment? The only rod—the only sceptre—that could be a fitting model of this measuring reed, must be that of Christ himself; the badge of his own sovereignty; which he is to exercise at last, in judging between the sheep and the goats; gathering to himself his little ones under his sceptre of peace, and smiting the wicked with his "rod of iron." Yes. It is to Christ's sceptre that the measuring reed is likened, and not to that of earthly kings. The commission to preach, and the commission to measure, come equally from him; and, by his own Spirit blessing the execution of this double office, he is separating unto himself a peculiar people, who shall be to the praise of his glory in the day of his appearing. There is some use, I apprehend, in resembling the measuring reed to this rod, the rod wielded by Christ himself; his ministry on earth being, as to its authority and tendency,—its commission to preach to all, and its efficacy to separate a peculiar people,—the result, alike, and the reflected image, of his own glorious supremacy.'—The Gentiles were not merely to possess the court which was without the temple, they were to tread under foot the holy city. Jerusalem is here used as the symbol of the Christian church. The term "treading under foot" denotes the subjection in which the church would be held, and the indignities with which she should be treated. Like Jerusalem, when taken by the Chaldeans, or rather like the same city when its site was ploughed by the Romans, its walls broken down, its stately palaces demolished, and the foe walking in triumph over the ruins, so the church of God was to exhibit, during this long and calamitous period, a spectacle of desolation. Her rights and privileges were to be taken from her; her ordinances were to be profaned; her Head was to be insulted, and her members persecuted and slain. These oppressions she should suffer for forty-two months, which is the precise length of time that the witnesses were to prophesy in sackcloth; the only difference being, that the period of the witnesses is given in days,—that of the treading under foot of the outer court by the Gentiles, in months (forty-two months, or forty-two times thirty days, that is, one thousand two hundred and sixty prophetic days or years). This, to our mind, is completely satisfactory that the profanation of the outer court and the prophesying of the witnesses were to be contemporaneous; and that it is the same event that is prefigured by both symbols,—the apostacy of the heathenish and persecuting church of Rome, and the indignities and oppressions to be endured by the true church during the continuance of that apostacy. We cannot but admire the appropriateness of the symbols, and the exact and lively picture which they exhibit of the leading events of the grand apostacy. John receives a measuring reed; the angel commands him to rise and measure the temple. He does so. On the authority of his Divine commission, and in the application of a Divine rule, he draws a line of separation between the pure and holy worshippers at the altar and the unclean and idolatrous multitude in the outer court. We behold Christendom divided into two ecclesiastical confederacies, vastly dissimilar in point of numbers, as well as in point of character. During one period of the forty-two prophetic months we behold the one company grown so small, that the inaccessible cliffs and caves of the Piedmontese Alps sufficed for their dwelling; and, though driven by the rage of man to dwell here, beloved of God, and enjoying access to him through the one Intercessor,—kings and priests unto God; while the other company was so numerous, that the wide plains and populous cities of the rest of Europe could scarce contain them. John, in measuring the temple, acted, as we have said, on a Divine commission, and by the application of a Divine rule; plainly though symbolically teaching us, that everything about the church,—her government, her worship, the admission of her members,—is to be regulated by the word of God.—S. V.]

3 And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days, clothed in sackcloth. 4 These are the two olive trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth. 5 And if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed. 6 These have power to shut heaven, that it rain not in the days of their prophecy: and have power over waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will. 7 And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them. 8 And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified. 9 And they of the people and kindreds and tongues and nations shall see their dead bodies three days and an half, and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves. 10 And they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry, and shall send gifts one to another; because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth. 11 And after three days and an half the Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them. 12 And they heard a great voice from heaven saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them. 13 And the same hour was there a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake were slain of men seven thousand: and the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven.

In this time of treading down God has reserved to him his faithful witnesses, that will not fail to attest the truth of his word and worship, and the excellency of his ways. Here observe,

First. The number of these witnesses; and it is but a small number, and yet it is sufficient. 1. It is but small. Many will own and acknowledge Christ in times of prosperity that will desert and deny him in times of persecution. One witness when the cause is upon trial is worth many at other times. 2. It is a sufficient number; for in the mouth of "two witnesses" every cause shall be established. Christ sent out his disciples two by two to preach the Gospel. Some think these two witnesses are Enoch and Elias, that are to return to the earth for a time. Others, the church of the believing Jews, and that of the Gentiles. It should rather seem they are God's eminent, faithful ministers, that shall not only continue to profess the Christian religion, but to preach it in the worst of times.

Secondly. The time of their prophesying, or bearing their testimony for Christ; "A thousand two hundred and threescore days;" that is, as many think, to the period of the reign of antichrist; and if the beginning of that interval could be ascertained, this number of prophetic days, taking a day for a year, would give us a prospect when the end shall be.

Thirdly. Their habit and posture. They prophesy in sackcloth, as those that are deeply affected with the low and distressed state of the churches and interest of Christ in the world.

4. How they were supported and supplied during the discharge of their great and hard work; they stood before the God of the whole earth, and he gave them power to prophesy. He made them to be like Zerubbabel and Joshua, the two olive-trees and candlesticks in the vision of Zechariah, Zec. iv. 3, &c. God gave them the oil of holy zeal, and courage, and strength, and comfort; made them olive-trees, and their lamps of profession were kept burning by the oil of inward, gracious principles, which they received from God. They had not only oil in their lamps, but in their vessels. Habits of spiritual life, light, and zeal.

Fifthly. Their security and defence during the time of their prophesying, ver. 5; if any attempted to hurt them, fire proceeded out of their mouths, and devoured them. Some think this alludes to Elias, his calling for fire from heaven to consume the captains and their companies that came to seize him, 2 Kin. i. 12. God promised the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. v. 14, "Behold, I will make my words in thy mouth fire, and this people shall be wood, and it shall devour them." By their praying, and preaching, and courage in suffering, they shall gall and wound the very hearts and consciences of many of their persecutors, that shall go away self-condemned, and be even terrors to themselves, like Pashur at the words of the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. xx. 4. They shall have that free access to God, and that interest in him, that at their prayers God will inflict plagues and judgments upon their enemies, as he did on Pharaoh, turning the 1260 days of the next verse. There is a correspondence in form to be noticed between Scripture periods. Our Lord's ministry lasted (according to the usual reckoning) about three years and a half. For this length of time the oppressions of Antiochus lasted. For three years and a half the drought in the days of Elijah lasted. Some have noted the similarity between the forty-two months here and the forty-two sojournings of Israel (Numb. xxxiii. 1–50).

xi. 3. "Power:" this word is not to be found in the original.

It runs, "I will give unto my two witnesses." On the meaning of these two witnesses, the Notes above give the interpretation most usually adopted by historical interpreters. Others, who regard the fulfilment of the Apocalypse still mostly future, interpret the two witnesses as two prophets who will appear on the earth during the time of the great apostacy. Among them De Burgh interprets the witnesses of Moses and Elijah, who will again appear. (Compare Mal. iv. 5, 6; Matt. xvii. 11; Acts iii. 21.) It is a custom among their rivers into blood, and restraining the dews of heaven,—shutting heaven up, that no rain shall fall for many days, as he did at the prayer of Elias, 1 Kin. xvii. 1. God has ordained his arrows for the persecutors, and is often plaguing them while they are persecuting his people: they find it hard work to “kick against the pricks.”

Sixthly. The slaying of the witnesses, to make their testimony more strong; they must seal it with blood. Here observe, 1. The time when they should be killed; “When they have finished their testimony.” They are immortal, they are invulnerable, till their work be done. Some think it ought to be rendered, “When they were about to finish their testimony;” when they had prophesied in sackcloth the greatest part of the one thousand two hundred and sixty years, then they should feel the last effect of antichristian malice. 2. The enemy that should overcome and slay them; “The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit.” Antichrist, the great instrument of the devil, he shall make war against them, not only with the arms of subtle and sophistical learning, but chiefly with open force and violence; and God would permit his enemies to prevail against his witnesses for a time. 3. The barbarous usage of these slain witnesses; the malice of their enemies was not satiated with their blood and death, but pursued even “their dead bodies.” 1st. They would not allow them a quiet grave; their bodies were cast out in the open street, the high street of Babylon, or in the high road leading to the city. This city is spiritually called Sodom, for monstrous wickedness; and Egypt, for idolatry and tyranny; and here Christ in his mystical body has suffered more than in any place in the world. 2nd. Their dead bodies were insulted by the inhabitants of the earth, and their death was a matter of mirth and joy to the antichristian world, ver. 10. They were glad to be rid of these witnesses, that by their doctrine and example had teased, terrified, and tormented the consciences of their enemies. These spiritual weapons cut wicked men to the heart, and fill them with the greatest rage and malice against the faithful.

Seventhly. The resurrection of these witnesses, and the consequences thereof. Where, 1. The time of their rising again; after they had lain dead “three days and an half,” ver. 11; a short time in comparison of that in which they had prophesied. Here may be a reference to the resurrection of Christ, who is “the resurrection and the life:” “Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise.” Or to the resurrection of Lazarus on the fourth day, when they thought it impossible. God’s witnesses may be slain, but they shall rise again; not in their persons, till the general resurrection, but in their successors. God will revive his work when it seems to be dead in the world. 2. The power by which they were raised; “The Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet.” God put not only life but courage into them. God can make the dry bones to live; it is the Spirit of life from God that quickens dead souls, and shall quicken the dead bodies of his people, and his dying interest in the world. 3. The effect of this upon their enemies; “Great fear fell upon them.” The reviving of God’s work and witnesses will strike terror into the souls of his enemies. Where there is guilt there is fear; and a persecuting spirit, though cruel, is not a courageous, but a cowardly spirit. Herod feared John the Baptist.

Eighthly. The ascension of the witnesses into heaven, and the consequences thereof, ver. 12, 13. Observe, 1. Their ascension. By heaven we may understand, either some more eminent station in the church, the kingdom of grace in this world, or to a high place in the kingdom of glory above. The former seems to be the meaning. “They ascended to heaven in a cloud,” in a figurative, not in a literal sense; “and their enemies beheld them.” It will be no small part of the punishment of persecutors, both in this world and at the great day, that they shall see the faithful servants of God greatly honoured and advanced. To this honour they did not attempt to ascend, till God called them, and said, “Come up hither.” The Lord’s witnesses must wait for their advancement, both in the church and in heaven, till God calls them; they must not be weary of sufferings and services, nor too hastily grasp at the reward, but stay till their Master calls them, and then they may gladly ascend to him. 2. The consequences of their ascension; and that was a mighty shock and convulsion in antichristian empire, and the fall of a tenth part of the city. Some refer this to the beginning of the reformation from popery, when many princes and states fell off from their subjection to Rome. This great work met with great opposition, all the western world felt a great concussion, and the antichristian interest received a great blow, and lost a great deal of ground and interest. 1st. By the sword of war, which was then drawn, and many of those that fought under the banner of antichrist were slain by it. 2nd. By the sword of the Spirit; “The fear of God fell upon many.” They were convinced of their errors, superstition, and idolatry; and by true repentance, and embracing the truth, they “gave glory to the God of heaven.” Thus, when God’s work and witnesses revive, the devil’s work and witnesses fall before him.

“I will give unto my two witnesses,” for so runs the original. The question is, What shall be given? The implied answer of our translation is, we think, the right one,—“power.” The power is spiritual; power to perceive the truth and reject the errors by which so many were to be misled; power to cleave to the truth, and resist the temptations before which the majority were to fall; power to proclaim the truth, and, by doing so, to convert others who might stand in their room and maintain their testimony when they should be called away, so that the line of witnesses should not be cut off, but ran continuously on till better times should come. Individually they would be removed by death or persecution, but as a body the witnesses should be inviolable. Their work is next defined: “They shall prophesy.” Prophesying means here, as in many other passages of the New Testament, every kind of preaching by Divine aid. The prophesying of the witnesses was not to consist in the revelation of new truths, but in condemning the world for its defection from old ones. They were to receive and profess the whole body of doctrine revealed by Christ and his apostles, and in doing so they should testify against the Romish apostasy. Hence the name given unto them,—“witnesses.” The name is borrowed from the Old Testament; “Ye are my witnesses,” said God to the ancient Israel. We are disposed, continues the author of the Seventh Vial, to concur in the opinion of Mr. Elliot, Mr. Faber, and others, that the reference here is to the eastern and western churches. The former has, with great historical research, and with complete success, traced a succession of witnesses in both churches, from the close of the sixth century till the Reformation. Such of our readers as may wish to have fuller information respecting the two witnesses, their reduced numbers, and their sore trials during the long period of their prophesying in sackcloth, may consult the Horæ Apocalypticæ. Speaking of the eastern Christians, and shewing their claim to be regarded as one of the two apocalyptic witnesses, Mr. Elliot remarks:—First, then, in regard both of ministers and congregations, the teachers and the taught, it is notorious that they bore a continuous and unvarying protest against those grosser superstitions of saint-mediatorship, image-worship, and other kinds of idolatry, through which the so-called Christians of the Roman world had degenerated into Gentiles of the outer court; and against which, consequently, witnesses answering to those of the Apocalypse must needs have testified. Second, though before the eyes of men the self-styled Catholics of the eastern and western Roman world seemed to constitute Christendom,—though they filled, as it were, the whole visible temple,—yet did these Paulicians’ (the name given to the eastern Christians) ‘regard and speak of them throughout as those who belonged not to the church of Christ, but, being apostates, belonged rather to the Gentile or outer court. Small as their numbers were, yet they called their assemblies the Catholic church, and said, “We are Christians, you are Romans.” As regards the witnesses of western origin, who has not heard of the Waldenses? Inhabiting the Cottian Alps, and those deep valleys through which the Rhone rolls, they maintained through successive ages their testimony against the corrupt churches of Roman Christendom. Mr. Elliot has likewise traced their history from the close of the sixth century till the era of the Reformation, not, indeed, without some breaks in the chain, which are not surprising when we take into account the remoteness of their times, and the obscurity in which they lived, but still with wonderful continuity. Here, amid these Alpine regions, they kept alive the lamp of truth, while darkness covered the rest of Europe. They were renowned for the purity of their faith, the simplicity of their life, and the constancy with which they testified against the Romish doctrines, resisting even unto blood. That the papal or Romish system was that of antichrist, which, from infancy in apostolic times, had grown gradually, by the increase of its constituent parts, to the stature of a full-grown man; that its prominent characteristics were, to defraud God of the worship due to him, rendering it to creatures, whether departed saints, relics, images, or antichrist, that is, the antichristian body itself; to defraud Christ, by attributing justification and forgiveness to antichrist’s authority and words, to saints’ intercessions, to the merit of men’s own performances, and to the fire of purgatory; to defraud the Holy Spirit, by attributing regeneration and sanctification to the opus operatum (I borrow the Fridentine term used afterwards) of the two sacraments, that the origin of this antichristian religion was the covetousness of the priesthood; its tendency to lead men away from Christ; its essence a vain ceremonial; its foundation the false notions of grace and forgiveness.—The visible assemblies of the Paulicians or Albigeois were extirpated by fire and sword, and the bleeding remnant escaped by flight, concealment, or Catholic conformity. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world. In the state, the church, and even in the cloister, a latent succession was preserved of the disciples of St. Paul, who protested against the tyranny of Rome, embraced the Bible as the rule of faith, and purified their creed from all the visions of the Gnostic theology. The struggles of Wickliffe in England, and of Huss in Bohemia, were premature and ineffectual; but the names of Zuinglius, Luther, and Calvin, are pronounced with gratitude as the deliverers of nations!—Gibbon. How striking a testimony, says Mr. Cunningham, is here given by an enemy of Christianity to the fulfilment of prophecy! Gibbon writing an involuntary comment on St. John.

(The heraldic arms of the Waldenses and their chief town, Lucerna, was the precise apocalyptic symbol of a lighted candlestick in the surrounding night, with the motto, ‘The light shineth in darkness.’)

The time when the witnesses should be slain is marked by these words: “When they shall have finished their testimony.” The verb ‘to finish’ is used in numerous passages in the New Testament in two distinct and different senses: first, to finish in point of time, so that the person ceases to act. Second, to finish in the way of perfecting the work on which he is employed; he has perfected, matured it; and, though he still repeats it, he ceases to perform it more completely or perfectly. Seeing the word is used in these two senses,—that of finishing a course of acting, and that of completing an act by performing all its parts, the question remains, In which of these senses is it here used? Whether does it relate to the time of prophesying,—the twelve hundred and sixty days,—or to the witness-bearing, μαρτυρία, abstractedly viewed? The more natural reference, we admit, is to the time of prophesying; and were there no elements of judgment but such as are found in the verse before us, we would at once grant that this is the true reference. But other considerations, springing from other parts of the Apocalypse, render this supposition impossible, and constrain us to apply the words to the μαρτυρία, ‘testimony,’ that is, to regard the slaying of the witnesses as foretold to happen, not at the end of the twelve hundred and sixty days, but as soon as they should have completed their testimony, which might be expected to happen whenever popery should be fully developed, and the testimony of the church have come to be pointed against all the leading errors in the papal system, which should then be seen and proclaimed to be the antichrist. But how stand the facts of history with our interpretation? They are in perfect accordance therewith. The Waldenses, the Vaudois, and other bodies of Christians, had borne an open testimony from the beginning against the various corruptions of Rome,—her errors in doctrine, her idolatries in worship, and her immoralities of life;—but at last, in the end of the twelfth century,—the same century in which, according to Gibbon, the meridian of some Jews, at some of their feasts, to leave a vacant chair for Elijah, whom they still expect to appear suddenly.

xi. 4. “Before the God:” all the ancient MSS. read “the Lord of the earth.”

xi. 5, 6. The miracles here described forcibly remind us of the miracles of Moses and Elijah—the shutting of the heavens from rain (1 Kings xvii. 1), the destruction of the enemies by fire (2 Kings i. 10), the water turned to blood. “The dews of Divine grace are withheld from all who scorn the two witnesses. The heavens are brass, the earth is iron to their foes (Deut. xxviii. 23). The waters of salvation become blood to revilers or scoffers of Scripture. To them the blessing is a bane, the Scripture a scourge, preaching a plague, the word a woe” (Wordsworth).

xi. 8. “Their dead bodies:” two out of the three best MSS. have the singular number, “their dead body.” “The great city . . . where also their (so all the best MSS. read) Lord was crucified:”

papal greatness was attained,—they proclaimed her to be the antichrist of Scripture—the harlot of the Apocalypse. Thus and then did the witnesses fulfil their testimony. It was foretold that this should be the signal for the beast to make war with them; and so it was. Rome as a body now moved against them, which she had not done before. The peaceful and fertile valleys of the Vaudois and the Waldenses were invaded, and speedily devastated with fire and sword; their towns and villages were burnt.—S. V. 'Milton,' says Dr. Keith, 'describes the scene with the power, without the fiction, of a poet. And without looking alone to the righteous retribution which awaits iniquity, he has obviously in view the words of the prophet,—that higher inspiration which no poetry alone can ever reach:

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
E'en them that kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones,
Forget not; in thy book record their groans,
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold Slain by the bloody Piemontese, that rolled Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
An hundred-fold, who, having learned the way, Early may fly the Babylonian woe!"

Calculations have been formed of the numbers whom popery has slain. From the year 1540 to the year 1570, comprehending only the space of thirty years, no fewer than nine hundred thousand Protestants were put to death by papists in the different countries of Europe. During the short pontificate of Paul the Fourth, which lasted only four years, the Inquisition alone, on the testimony of Vergerius, destroyed a hundred and fifty thousand. Those that perished in Germany during the wars of Charles the Fifth, and in Flanders under the infamous Alva, are counted by hundreds of thousands. For a number of years, especially after the Reformation, these countries swarmed with executioners, and were covered with scaffolds and fires. In France several millions were destroyed in the innumerable massacres that took place in that kingdom. It has been calculated that, since the rise of the papacy, not fewer than fifty millions of persons have been put to death on account of religion. Of this inconceivable number the greater part have been cut off during the last six hundred years, for the papacy persecuted very little during the first half of its existence; it was not till the witnesses completed their testimony that it made war against them. Fifty millions in the space of six hundred years gives a rate of upwards of eighty thousand every year. Let us think of eighty thousand human beings destroyed year after year for the long period of six hundred years, till at last the numbers are swelled to the overwhelming amount of fifty millions! What a fearful meaning does this give to the words of John, "I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus. And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth!"

The two witnesses were not individuals, but organized societies—churches. Their death, therefore, must needs be symbolic; not their death as individuals, but their apparent extermination as organized societies—the suppression of that public testimony which these churches had borne before Christendom. Now, if we look back, we discover but one period in the history of Christendom to which the prediction can apply,—the period we have indicated,—the beginning of the sixteenth century, just before the Reformation. 'In turning from prophecy to history,' says Mr. Elliot, 'from the symbolic picture to the thing symbolized, it seems almost impossible to mistake the precise scene and occasion alluded to. It can surely be none other than that of the very Lateran Council held from 1512 to 1517, under the pontificates of Julius the Second, and Leo the Tenth, just before the Reformation.' Having stated that the object for which this council was assembled was the suppression of all that might yet remain in western Christendom of witnesses for Christ, and particularly the Bohemian Hussites,—for both the Lollards of England and the Waldenses of Piedmont had been reduced to silence,—Mr. Elliot resumes:—'In a papal bull issued, with approbation of the council, in the very next or eighth session, held December 1513, a charge was issued summoning the dissidents in question (the Bohemian witnesses) without fail to appear and plead before the council at its next session; unless indeed they should have previously done so before a neighbouring papal legate, the object declared being their conviction, and reduction within the bosom of the Catholic church; and the time finally fixed for the said important session, May the 5th, in the spring ensuing.' Thus was the crisis come which was to try the faith of this bleeding remnant of witnesses, and exhibit its vitality or death. And would they then face their Lord's enemies? Would they brave the terrors of death, and plead his cause before the lordly legate, or the antichristian council; like the Waldenses at Albi and at Pamiers, like Wickliffe and Cobham in England, like Huss and Jerome at the Constance Council, or Luther afterwards at Augsburg and at Worms? Alas, no! The day of the ninth session arrived. The council met. But no report from the cardinal legate gave intimation either of the pleading, or even of any continued stirring, of the Bohemian heretics. No officer of the council announced the arrival of deputies from them to plead before it. Nor, again, was there a whisper wafted to the synod from any other state, or city, or town in Christendom, of a movement made, or a mouth opened, to promulgate or support the ancient heresies. Throughout the length and breadth of Christendom Christ's witnessing servants were silenced; they appeared as dead. The orator of the session ascended the pulpit, and amid the applause of the assembled council, uttered that memorable exclamation of triumph,—an exclamation which, notwithstanding the long multiplied anti-heretical decrees of popes and councils,—notwithstanding the yet more multiplied anti-heretical crusades and inquisitorial fires,—was never, I believe, pronounced before, and certainly never since: 'Jam nemo reclamatur, nullus obsistit!'—There is an end of resistance to the papal rule and religion; oppressors there exist no more.' So did 'they from the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations,' assembled in the πρωτεύς, or 'broad place of the great city,' look on Christ's witnesses as (from thenceforth) dead. Let the reader well mark the description, for it is a description from the life; and let him well mark the day, for it seems scarce possible that we can be mistaken in regarding it as the precise commencing date of the predicted three and a half years, during which Christ's witnesses were to appear as dead corpses in the face of Christendom. It was May 5, 1514. So ended the long and furious war waged by the beast against the witnesses. Christianity, after existing during fifteen centuries, had become extinct, as regarded the public profession of it. There were a few individual saints still upon the earth, but there was nowhere a church. There were none who now dared open their mouth and proclaim Rome to be antichrist. The event was astounding; and yet it was only what the prophecy had foretold: "The beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them." It was a dark night, yet but the prelude to a glorious morning. It is well remarked by Mr. Elliot, that it is clear from these words, "they of [from] the people, and kindreds," &c., that there was to be an assembly of deputies from all parts of the papal world, at the time that the dead bodies of the witnesses should be lying on the street of the city, who should behold and enjoy the spectacle. This was remarkably fulfilled in the Lateran Council then met at Rome, composed, as it was, of princes and prelates from every part of the Roman world. But what are we to understand by the prediction, "and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves?" Mr. Elliot mentions a fact which we presume to think is the true explanation of the matter. The same day on which it was proclaimed that there were no longer any opposers to the papal rule and religion the council issued an edict cutting off all heretics, of whatever kind, and of whatever nation, from the church, and decreeing against them the usual punishments. Seeing that, on the avowal of Rome herself, there was no longer any organized church anywhere opposing her authority, the edict could have respect only to individual dissentients which might and did exist, though concealed, in some places,—the corpses of the witnesses. These, by her edict, she cast out of the church, and adjudged to contempt and punishment. By her famous proclamation, 'Jam nemo reclamatur, nullus obsistit!' she affirmed that the witnesses were slain; by the edict that followed, she proclaimed that their remains were still upon the earth. That edict, in truth, served the same end to these remains of the witnesses which the refusal of burial does to a dead body,—it kept them in the sight of men. Now, indeed, there was rejoicing. The two witnesses were slain, and every square and street of the great city rang with shouts of triumph over their death,—"rejoicing and making merry, and sending gifts one to another"—whose terms are borrowed from the customs of ancient festive occasions, is finely and vividly descriptive of the unbounded exultation and congratulation which reigned throughout the Roman world, now that all heresy, as was supposed, was for ever suppressed. But since man was placed upon the earth the triumphing of the wicked is short. Accordingly, the next event that happens on the apocalyptic scene is the resurrection of the slain witnesses. "And after three days and an half the Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon them which saw them." 'But does the chronology suit?' asks Mr. Elliot. 'It was predicted that for three and a half days the witnesses were to be looked on as dead; in other words, that there was to be the interval of three and a half years between the first recognition of their extinction by the assembled deputies from the states of Christendom, and their resuscitation. Was this the interval between that memorable day of the ninth session of the Lateran Council, on which the orator pronounced his pan of triumph over the extinction of heretics and schismatics, and the first and yet more memorable act of protestation by Luther? Let us calculate. The day of the ninth session was, as we have seen, May 5, 1514; the day of Luther's posting up his theses at Wittenberg, (the well-known epoch of the Reformation), October 31, 1517. Now, from May 5, 1514, to May 5, 1517, are three years; and from May 5, 1517, to October 31 of the same year, 1517, the reckoning in days is as follows:

May 5—31.....	27	August.....	31
June.....	30	September.....	30
July.....	31	October.....	31

In all one hundred and eighty, or half three hundred and sixty, days; that is, just half a year. So that the whole interval is precisely, to a day, three and a half years,—precisely, to a day, the period predicted in the apocalyptic prophecy! Oh, wonderful prophecy! is the exclamation that again forces itself on my mind. Oh the depth of the riches of the wisdom and the foreknowledge of God!—That the symbol of the rising from the dead was fulfilled in the fact that although the martyrs continued in their graves, the cause for which they had suffered arose, we may appeal to the testimony of both friends and foes. 'And I,' said John Huss, speaking of the gospel preachers that should appear after he had suffered at the stake, 'and I, awakening as it were from the dead, and rising from the grave, shall rejoice with exceeding great joy.' Again, in 1523, after the Reformation had broken out, we find Pope Hadrian saying, in a missive addressed to the Diet at Nuremberg,—'The heretics Huss and Jerome are now alive again in the person of Martin Luther.' The consternation and dismay which fell upon all the adherents of the papacy when Luther arose, and the Reformation under him began to gain ground, is a fact too well known to every reader of the history of the period to need any particular illustration here. "And they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them, Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them." Christ, after his resurrection, ascended to heaven in a cloud; so was his church received up at the Reformation. Whatever tended to give protection and influence to the church of the Reformation, may be justly regarded as the fulfilment of this symbol,—the civil laws passed in her favour, by which, in several of the countries of Europe, she was placed in the enjoyment of full religious toleration, and could worship without incurring, as aforesaid, either civil or ecclesiastical penalties. The exposition most in harmony with this ascension symbol is that given by Dr. Candlish, in his Four Letters to Elliot, and which is as follows: 'Thus, generally, it may be said concerning the apocalyptic distinction between the heaven and the earth, that the one represents the region of influence, the other the region of events: the one the seat of power, the other the seat of action; the first the ideal locality, or, as it were, retiring-room, in which the unseen agencies that tell upon the world's history meet, and mingle, and adjust themselves,—the last the actual locality, or open stage on which the palpable occurrences of that history are enacted. Thus, on the earth the Reformation is begun. For a time, the agents in that mighty work,—Luther and his compeers,—are like passive instruments, acted upon rather than acting,—Luther himself being like one blindly driven by a superior force, which he can neither measure nor explain. He puts forth vast power, but it is as one impelled or possessed. He cannot regulate his own movements; he

this phrase, which clearly points to Jerusalem, is understood by some of the futurist interpreters as denoting the literal Jerusalem, which is to become the centre of the world's apostacy. Those who understand the whole prophecy as pointing to the struggles of pure faith against Romish error, take the names as having a spiritual significance. "The characteristic of Sodom is pollution, of Egypt tyranny, of Jerusalem apostacy. Hence Rome is called Sodom, Egypt, and Jerusalem, as having the three characteristics united."

xi. 15. "The seventh angel sounded:" the angel who sounds the trumpet of Christ's final triumph. Compare chap. x. 7, where the language indicates a preparation, as it were, for the final sounding of the trumpet. "The kingdoms:" Alford, following all the ancient MSS., renders, "The kingdom over the world is become our Lord's, and of his Christ."

recoils, and is reluctant; he knows not whither his steps are leading him, and he staggers as he finds himself in front of the papal bull. But, by and by, the principles thus rudely wrought out, in the region of events, pass again, with their great Author and Inspirer, into the region of influence. The Reformation becomes something more than an uncontrollable effect; it becomes a commanding cause. The motives and impulses which, as if spontaneously and simultaneously, stirred everywhere the irrepressible revolt against Rome's intolerable tyranny, are gathered up, systematized, and elevated into the high position of a ruling power, not only in morals and religion, but in the whole economy, also, of the social system of the world. In a word, the scheme of Protestant doctrine,—based upon the sole supremacy of the Scriptures as the rule of faith, and of the Spirit as the interpreter of the Scriptures,—was settled and promulgated, as a testimony for Christ, open, authoritative, and influential; and the harmony of the Reformed confessions became, as to its spirit and substance, the true ascension of the witnesses. Certainly, nothing has more struck and startled their enemies than this, in so far as it has been wrought out. It has been really, in an intellectual and spiritual point of view, more noticeable, as a source of real trouble to them, than all the Protestant establishments in Christendom put together. Their very anxiety to exaggerate real and to invent imaginary discrepancies among Protestants proves how keenly they are stung by the essential and Divine unity of the Reformation testimony, in favour of a free salvation by grace, through faith alone. It is this holy and heavenly system that they hate and fear; and its exaltation, as by a voice from heaven, into a principle of paramount influence, in the teaching and standards of the Reformers, is the real cause of the amazement with which "their enemies beheld them." The resurrection of the witnesses, like that of their Lord, was accompanied by an earthquake. The earthquake was connected with, and sprung out of, the resurrection, and may therefore be viewed as symbolizing a revolution mainly of a moral or religious character. In the earthquake, "the tenth part of the city fell." To explain this, we have only to bear in mind that the city was constituted of the ten Roman kingdoms of Europe confederated under the papacy. Which of these ten kingdoms was it that fell at the Reformation, as a popish country? The answer is, Britain. The fall of this tenth part (the tithe) of this city was the first-fruits, as it were, of that great harvest of destruction awaiting the papacy. An important announcement follows: "The second woe is past; and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly." The second woe, the Turks, came to its height in 1572, about the same time that the Reformation was established; but could not be said to be past, till about the middle of the eighteenth century. The third woe was to begin when the seventh trumpet should be sounded, and was to comprehend the seven last plagues of mystic Babylon. "The third woe cometh quickly." There was an interval of five hundred years between the first and second woe; but the second was to be followed by the third, at the distance of only about fifteen years. It was to do its work quickly, after it did come. By a series of fearful and exterminating judgments, following each other with astounding rapidity, was Rome to be brought down. The seventh trumpet now to be sounded was her death-knell; but though to her a terrific peal, it was a trumpet of jubilee to the church; it announced the destruction of her great enemy, and the deliverance of the nations, who were henceforth to become the kingdoms of her Lord, and of her Christ. Accordingly, no sooner did it sound than great voices were heard in heaven, proclaiming the reduction of the world under the reign of God.—S. V.]

14 The second woe is past; and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly. 15 And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever. 16 And the four and twenty elders, which sat before God on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, 17 Saying, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come;—because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. 18 And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth. 19 And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple the ark of his testament: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.

We have here the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet, which is ushered in by the usual warning and demand of attention: "The second woe is past, and, behold, the third woe cometh quickly." Then "the seventh angel sounded." This had been suspended for some time, till the apostle had been made acquainted with some intervening occurrences of very great moment, and worthy of his notice and observation. But what he before expected he now heard, the seventh angel sounding. And here observe the effects and consequences of this trumpet thus sounded.

First. Here were loud and joyful acclamations of the saints and angels in heaven. Where observe, 1. The manner of their adorations. They rose from their seats, and "fell upon their faces, and worshipped God." They did it with reverence and humility. 2. The matter of their adorations. 1st. They thankfully recognize the right of our God and Saviour to rule and reign over all the world; ver. 15, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ." They were always so in title, both by creation and purchase. 2nd. They thankfully observe his actual possession of them, and reign over them. They give him thanks because he had taken to him his great power, asserted his rights, and exerted his power, and so turned title into possession. 3. They rejoice that this his reign shall never end: "He shall reign for ever and ever, till all enemies be put under his feet;" none shall ever wrest the sceptre out of his hand.

Secondly. Here were angry resentments in the world, at these just appearances and acts of the power of God, ver. 18. The nations were angry; not only had been so, but were so still. Their hearts rose up against God,—they met his wrath with their own anger; it was a time when God was taking a just revenge upon the enemies of his people, recompensing tribulation to them that had troubled them. It was a time in which he was beginning to reward his people's faithful services and sufferings; and their enemies could not bear it,—they fretted against God, and so increased their guilt, and hastened their destruction.

Thirdly. Another consequence was the opening of the temple of God in heaven. Whereby may be meant, that here is now a more free communication between heaven and earth; prayer and praises more freely and frequently ascending, and graces and blessings plentifully descending. But it rather seems to intend, the church of God on earth, a heavenly temple. And it is an allusion to the various circumstances of things in the time of the first temple, under idolatrous and wicked princes, it was shut up and neglected; but under religious and reforming princes it was opened and frequented. So, during the power of antichrist, the temple of God seemed to be shut up, and was so in a great degree; but now it was opened again. And at this opening of it observe, 1. What was seen there; "The ark of God's testament." This was in the holy of holies; in this ark the tables of the law were kept. As before Josiah's time the law of God had been lost, but was then found, so in the reign of antichrist God's law was laid aside, and made void by their traditions and decrees; the Scriptures were locked up from the people, and they must not look into these Divine oracles; now they are opened, now they are brought to the view of all. This was an unspeakable and invaluable privilege; and this, like the ark of the testament, was a token of the presence of God returned to his people, and his favour towards them in Jesus Christ the propitiation. 2. What was heard and felt there; "Lightnings, voices, thunderings, an earthquake, and great hail." The great blessing of the Reformation was attended with very awful providences, and, by terrible things in righteousness, God would answer those prayers that were presented in his holy temple, now opened. All the great revolutions of the world are concerted in heaven, and are the answers of the prayers of the saints.

CHAPTER XII.

It is generally agreed by the most learned expositors that the narrative we have in this and the two following chapters, from the sounding of the seventh trumpet to the opening of the vials, is not a prediction of things to come, but rather a recapitulation and representation of things past; which, as God would have the apostle to foresee while future, he would have him to review now they were past, that he might have a more perfect idea of them in his mind, and might observe the agreement between the prophecy and that Providence that is always fulfilling the Scriptures. In this chapter we have an account of the contest between the church and antichrist: the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. I. As it was begun in heaven, ver. 1—14. II. As it was carried on in the wilderness, ver. 15 to the end.

AND there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars: 2 And she being with child cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered. 3 And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. 4 And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth: and the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born. 5 And she brought forth a man child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron: and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne. 6 And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days. 7 And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels, 8 And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. 9 And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the Devil, and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world: he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were longer need speak of him who "is to come," for he that was to come has come, taken his great might, and reigns for ever.

x. 19. "The temple of God was opened." "More open discoveries were made to the seer, or rather, a clearer manifestation of the innermost and most spiritual truths of the Gospel" (Webster and Wilkinson).

xii. 1. "A great wonder:" rather, "a great sign." The word has not been used before in the Apocalypse, though it would well describe many of the preceding representations. The only visions to which it is applied afterwards are those of the beast (verse 3) and of the seven angels of the last plagues. Perhaps it denotes not so much that which is significant as remarkable, something surpassingly sublime or terrific, extraordinary in its mystic character among mysteries, as miracles (to which the same word is sometimes applied) are among common events (Webster and Wilkinson). "Woman clothed with the sun;" compare the description in S. Song. vi. 10.

cast out with him. 10 And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. 11 And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death.

Here we see that early prophecy eminently fulfilled, in which God said he would put enmity between the seed of woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. Where you will observe,

First. The attempts of Satan and his agents, to prevent the increase of the church, by devouring her offspring as soon as it was born. Of this we have a very lively description, in the most proper images.

1. We see how the church is represented in this vision. 1st. As "a woman," the weaker part of the world; but the spouse of Christ, and the mother of the saints. 2nd. As "clothed with the sun," the imputed righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. Having put on Christ, who is "the Sun of righteousness," she, by her relation to Christ, is invested with honourable rights and privileges, and shines in his rays. 3rd. As having "the moon under her feet," that is, the world. She stands upon it, but lives above it; her heart and hope is not set upon sublunary things, but on the things that are in heaven, where her Head is. 4th. As having on "her head a crown of twelve stars;" that is, the doctrine of the Gospel preached by the twelve apostles, which is a crown of glory to all true believers. 5th. As in travail, crying out, "and pained to be delivered." She was pregnant, and now in pain to bring forth a holy progeny to Christ. Desirous that what was begun in the conviction of sinners might end in their conversion; and when the children were brought to the birth, there might be strength to bring forth, and that she might see of the travail of her soul.

2. How the grand enemy of the church is represented. 1st. As "a great red dragon." "A dragon," for strength and terror; "a red dragon," for fierceness and cruelty. 2nd. As "having seven heads," that is, placed on seven hills, as Rome was; and therefore it is probable pagan Rome is here meant. 3rd. As "having ten horns," divided into ten provinces, as the Roman empire was by Augustus Cæsar. 4th. As having "seven crowns upon his heads," which is after expounded to be seven kings, ch. xvii. 10. 5th. As drawing with his tail a "third part of the stars of heaven," and casting them down to the earth. Turning the ministers and professors of the Christian religion out of their places and privileges, and making them as weak and useless as he could. 6th. As standing "before the woman, to devour her child as soon as it should be born." Very vigilant to crush the Christian religion in its birth, and entirely to prevent the growth and continuance of it in the world.

FROM MEDAL OF MAXIMIN AS HERCULES DESTROYING THE HYDRA OF CHRISTIANITY.

Secondly. The unsuccessfulness of these attempts against the church. For, 1. She was safely delivered of "a man-child," ver. 5. By which some understand Christ; others, Constantine; but others, with greater propriety, a race of true believers, strong and united, resembling Christ, and designed, under him, to rule the nations with a rod of iron; that is, shall judge the world, by their doctrine and lives now, and as assessors with Christ at the great day.

2. Care was taken of this child; it "was caught up to God, and to his throne;" that is, taken into his special, powerful, and immediate protection. The Christian religion has been, from its infancy, the special care of the great God, "and our Saviour Jesus Christ."

3. Care was taken of the mother, as well as of the child; ver. 6, she "fled into the wilderness; a place prepared" both for her safety and sustenance. The church was in an obscure state, dispersed; and this proved her security, through the care of Divine providence. This, her obscure and private state, was for a limited time, not to continue always.

Thirdly. The attempts of the dragon do not only prove unsuccessfull against the church, but fatal to his own interests; for, upon his endeavour to devour the man-child, he engaged all the powers of heaven against him; ver. 7, "There was war in heaven." Heaven will espouse the quarrel of the church. Here observe,

1. The seat of this war; in heaven, in the church, which is the kingdom of heaven on earth; and under the care of Heaven, and in the same interest.

2. The parties; "Michael and his angels" on one side, and "the dragon and his angels" on the other. Christ, the great angel of the covenant, and his faithful followers; and Satan and all his instruments. This latter party would be much superior in number and outward strength to the other; but the strength of the church lies in having the Lord Jesus for the Captain of their salvation.

3. The success of the battle; "The dragon and his angels fought, and prevailed not." There was a great struggle on both sides, but the victory fell to Christ and his church; and the dragon and his angels were not only conquered, but cast out. The pagan idolatry, which was worshipping devils, was extirpated out of the empire in the time of Constantine.

Fourthly. The triumphant song that was composed and used on this occasion, ver. 11. Where observe,

1. How the Conqueror is adored; "Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ." Now God hath shewn himself to be a mighty God; now Christ hath shewn himself to be a strong and mighty Saviour. His own arm has brought salvation, and now his kingdom will be greatly enlarged and established. The salvation and strength of the church is all to be ascribed to the King and Head of the church.

2. How the conquered enemy is described. 1st. By his malice. He was "the accuser of the brethren," and "accused them before their God, night and day." He appeared before God as an adversary to the church, continually bringing in indictments and accusations against them, whether true or false. Thus he accused Job, and thus he accused Joshua the high priest, Zec. iii. 1. Though he hates the presence of God, yet he is willing to appear there to accuse the people of God. Let us therefore take heed that we give him no cause of accusation against us; and that, when we have sinned, we presently go in before the Lord, and accuse and condemn ourselves, and commit our cause to Christ, as our advocate. 2nd. By his disappointment and defeat. He and all his accusations are cast out, the indictments quashed, and the accuser turned out of the court with just indignation.

3. How the victory was gained. The servants of God overcame Satan, 1st. "By the blood of the Lamb," as the meritorious cause. Christ, by dying, destroyed him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil. 2nd. "By the word of their testimony," as the great instrument of war, "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God." By a resolute, powerful preaching the everlasting Gospel, "which is mighty through God, to pull down strongholds." By their courage and patience in sufferings; "They loved not their lives unto the death." When the love of life stood in competition with their loyalty to Christ, they loved not their lives so well but they could give them up to death, could lay them down in Christ's cause. Their love to their own lives was overcome by stronger affections of another nature; and this, their courage and zeal, helped to confound their enemies, and to convince many of the spectators, and to confirm the souls of the faithful, and so contributed greatly to this victory.

12 Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. 13 And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man child. 14 And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent. 15 And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood. 16 And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth. 17 And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

We have here an account of this war, so happily finished in heaven, or in the church, as it was again renewed and carried on in the wilderness, the place to which the church was fled, and where she had been for some time secured, by the special care of her God and Saviour. Observe,

First. The warning given of that distress and calamity that should fall upon the inhabitants of the world in general, through the wrath and rage of the devil; for though his malice is chiefly bent against the servants of God, yet he

The clothing with the sun is understood by some to indicate the Church invested with the light of Divine truth, of spiritual life, and salvation to enlighten and revive the world. "The moon under her feet," taken by some to indicate the Church in her temporal aspect, subject to change; by others to mean the inferiority and fickleness of world-religions, which failed to give enduring light to men. "Twelve stars:" by some referred to the twelve tribes of Israel, by others to the twelve apostles.

xii. 5. "Rod of iron:" understood by Wordsworth and others of the inflexible rule of God's Word. "With it the masculine spirits of the Church, being endowed with power by Christ, overcome the world; they shiver into atoms the earthy, brittle theories of corrupt religion and carnal philosophy" (Wordsworth).

xii. 11. "They overcame by the blood of the Lamb:" Alford here and in the next clause renders "because of." The preposition here used is followed by the accusative case, and points to the antecedent is an enemy and hater of mankind as such; and, being defeated in his designs against the church, he is resolved to give all the disturbance he can to the world in general; ver. 12, "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and sea." The rage of Satan grows so much the greater as he is limited both in place and time. When he was confined to the wilderness, and had but a short time to reign there, he comes with the greater wrath.

Secondly. His second attempt upon the church now in the wilderness; "He persecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child," ver. 13. Observe, 1. The care that God had taken of his church. He had conveyed her, as on eagles' wings, into a place of safety provided for her, where she was to continue for a certain space of time, couched in prophetic characters, taken from Jaan. vii. 25.

2. The continual malice of the dragon against the church. Her obscurity could not altogether protect her. The old subtle serpent, that at first lurked in paradise, now follows the church into the wilderness, and casts out a flood of error and heresy, which were breathed by Arius, Nestorius, Pelagius, and many more, by which the church of God was in danger of being overwhelmed and carried away. The church of God is in more danger from heretics than from persecutors; and heresies are as certainly from the devil as open force and violence.

Thirdly. The seasonable help provided for the church in this dangerous juncture; ver. 16, "The earth helped the woman, and opened her mouth and swallowed up the flood." Some think we are to understand the swarms of Goths and Vandals that invaded the Roman empire, and found work for the Arian rulers, that otherwise would have been as furious persecutors as the pagan had been, and had exercised great cruelties already; but God opened a breach of war, and the flood was in a manner swallowed up thereby, and the church enjoyed some respite. God often sends the sword to avenge the quarrel of his covenant. And when men choose new gods, then there is danger of war in the gates. Intestine broils and contentions often end in the invasions of a common enemy.

Fourthly. The devil, being thus defeated in his designs upon the universal church, now turns his rage against particular persons and places. His malice against the woman pushes him on "to make war with the remnant of her seed." Some think hereby are meant the Albigeuses, that were first by Diocletian driven up into barren and mountainous places, and afterwards cruelly murdered by popish rage and power, for several generations; and for no other reason but because they kept the commandments of God, and held the testimony of Jesus Christ. Their fidelity to God and Christ, both in doctrine, worship, and practice, was that which exposed them to the rage of Satan and his instruments; and will do so still, less or more, to the end of the world, when the last enemy shall be destroyed.

[The period when the woman was thus arrayed and ready to bring forth the man-child, or when the church was exhibited in her children as in a state of grandeur, prosperity, and power, was about the year 313, when the celebrated decree of Licinius and Constantine was issued; when two-thirds of the Roman empire became professedly Christian, and only one third of it continued pagan, under Maximin, and continued to persecute the Christians. We have, then, the Christian church united—bright from trials she had passed through—ascendant in the political firmament—emperors shedding on it the rays of the imperial sun, and her chief ministers a starry coronal around her head. Now, the commencement of the woman's gestation was the year 33, the year of our Lord's resurrection, when the church, properly speaking, became developed. From that period there elapsed, on obvious grounds, the number of nine prophetic months, or forty prophetic weeks, or two hundred and eighty prophetic days; that is, two hundred and eighty literal years, which is the illustration of the chronological period here mysteriously shadowed forth. Adding, then, to the year 33—the year of our Lord's resurrection—the nine prophetic months, or the two hundred and eighty literal years, we come down to the year 313, when the Milan decree was issued. Her travail began a prophetic week, or seven literal years, previously in the Diocletian persecution, and amid the prosperity, toleration, and countenance accorded to the Christians, the man-child was brought forth, and speedily raised to imperial power, invested with all the patronage of emperors, and while the old pagan Roman power, or the dragon, concentrated in Maximin, the ruler of a third of the empire, stood by ready to destroy him, but was prevented from accomplishing his purpose. "Then," says Gibbon, "the death of Maximin delivered the church from the last and most implacable of her enemies." In other words, in A. D. 313, when the woman brought forth the man-child, the dragon lost his power; he beheld the outpeering grandeur and elevation of the Christian church, or, in the words of Gibbon, "Christianity seated on the throne of the Roman world," and Theodosius and the Christians already ruling the pagans with a rod of iron. It is said, "I heard a loud voice from heaven," that is, from the firmamental heaven, from which Mahomet, as a star, fell; that is, the high places of authority and power "saying, Now is come salvation," &c. It was the song of the rejoicing Christians, at length raised from their outward affliction to prosperity and grandeur,—a period at which they most erroneously, but naturally, on so great and unexpected a transition, supposed that the millennial kingdom had arrived. It was an era so bright and brilliant that dawned upon the world, that even the martyrlogist, Fox, has recorded it as his conviction, that the millennium began when Constantine established the Christian church.

After this song was sung by the Christians raised to power and authority, it is said, "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth." But this woe, mentioned in ver. 12, is no part of the song of victor, and it is to be regretted that the break in the chapter is not marked to shew at such is the case. "And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony. Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them." Then a new paragraph, being no part of the song of the triumphant Christians, but dictated to John by the Holy Spirit, begins: "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea; for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time." Now, after this prosperity—this outward and visible prosperity, which encompassed the outward and the visible church—is there in the page of history the record of any woe that fell speedily on Christendom? At the very period when the church rose to almost more than earthly grandeur, there burst upon the world a woe almost unprecedented in the history of the past; that woe was the outbreak of the most pestilent heresy that ever tormented the church—what is called the Arian heresy. Arius, a presbyter or minister of Alexandria, first denied the deity of Christ, and, of necessity, rejected the atonement. Such, then, was the woe that fell upon the church of those times—a dark and blasting stain—distinct from popery in its dogmas, but conspiring with it against truth, the one a negation of truth—the other a deadly corruption of it. After this we read of the woman's flight into the wilderness; that is, true Christians ceased to be seen—they did not appear to the world; and Milner, the historian, gives the best fulfilment of this when he states that, in consequence of Arianism without, and the church's exaltation to civil and imperial greatness, "the practical use of a crucified Saviour for troubled consciences was scarcely to be seen, and the real Gospel of Christ began to be hidden from men,—the true church, in short, was about to retire into the wilderness. 'Godliness,' he adds, 'lived obscure in hermitages, and abroad the Gospel was almost buried in faction and ambition.' And Mosheim also, a less spiritual but no less true historian, says, 'Good men were mixed with the bad; but, by degrees, the bad so multiplied that men truly holy and devoted to God appeared more rarely, and the pious few were almost crushed by the vicious multitude;' and 'fictions,' adds Mosheim, 'of early origin, about saint-veneration and relics, and purifying, or fire, and celibacy, now so prevailed as, in course of time, almost to thrust true religion aside, or at least to obscure and tarnish it.' But we find another incident recorded in this chapter; two wings of a great eagle were given to the woman to help her to go into the wilderness. The recognition of vital Christianity by the pious emperor Theodosius aided Christ's people. He cast the Arians out from the churches, restored, we are told, the Trinitarians, and saved the empire for eighteen years from the impending irruption of the Goths—during which suspense and interval the woman had time to prepare for her flight into the wilderness. These eighteen years were the respite. It is a remarkable fact, that the Vandals, Visigoths, and Huns, who had adopted universally the Arian or Socinian creed, rushed into Rome, endeavouring to exterminate Trinitarians wherever they found them, and to establish the Arian heresy as supreme over the length and breadth of the empire. But it is added here, that when the dragon poured these floods after her, "the earth opened her mouth and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth." What is the solution of this? We find that when the Arian Goths invaded Rome, they did not, as the Mahometans, retain their own religion and their own king, and insist on the conquered adopting them. On the contrary, they parted with all—they were quite absorbed by the orthodox Romans—they renounced their Arianism as they settled, and were merged amid the Trinitarian population; and thus the earth, in the language of the Apocalypse, swallowed up the flood, and helped the woman in her flight into the wilderness.—A.S.]

We have in this chapter a farther discovery and description of the church's enemies, not other enemies than are mentioned before, but described after another manner, that the methods of their enmity may more fully appear. They are represented as two beasts: the first you have an account of, ver. 1—11; the second, ver. 12 to the end. By the first some understand Rome pagan; and by the second, Rome papal. But others understand Rome papal to be represented by both these beasts; by the first in its secular power, by the second in its ecclesiastical.

AND I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy. 2 And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion: and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority. 3 And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast. 4 And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? 5 And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies; and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. 6 And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven. 7 And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations. 8 And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. 9 If any man have an ear, let him hear. 10 He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity: he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints.

or remoter cause. They overcame because of the blood of the Lamb—i.e., because Christ had died for them. So also "because of the word"—i.e., on account of the word of their testimony.

xii. 12. "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth:" all the old MSS. read, "Woe to the earth and the sea."

xii. 14. "Two wings:" rather, "two wings of the great eagle." Compare Exod. xix. 4, to which allusion may be here made. The powerful support and protection of the Divine Providence here indicated has been manifested both to the Church of the Old Testament and of the New.

xii. 15. "Flood:" Alford renders "river" in both this verse and the following.

xiii. 1. "And I stood:" some of the best MSS. read "he stood." This throws the reference back to the closing verse of chap. xii. The dragon standing on the sand of the sea gave his power to the beast which rose out of it. "A beast:" rendered by Alford "wild

First. From what situation the apostle saw this monster. He seemed to himself to stand upon the sea-shore, though it is probable he was still in a rapture; but he took himself to be in "the island Patmos;" but whether in the body or out of the body he could not tell.

Secondly. From whence this beast came; "Out of the sea." And yet, by the description of it, it should be more likely to be a land monster; but the more monstrous every thing about it was, the more proper an emblem it would be to set forth the mystery of iniquity and tyranny.

Thirdly. What was the form and shape of this beast. It was, for the most part, "like a leopard," but its feet were like "the feet of a bear, and its mouth as the mouth of a lion;" it had "seven heads and ten horns, and upon its heads the name of blasphemy;" a most horrid, hideous monster! In some part of this description here seems to be an allusion to Daniel's vision of the four beasts which represented the four monarchies, Dan. vii. 1-3, &c. One of those beasts was like a lion, another like a bear, and another like a leopard. This beast was a sort of composition of those three, with the fierceness, strength, and swiftness of them all. The seven heads, and the ten horns, seem to design its several powers; the ten crowns, its tributary princes; the word "blasphemy" on its forehead proclaims its direct enmity and opposition to the glory of God, by promoting idolatry.

Fourthly. The source and spring of his authority; and that was, "the dragon;" he "gave him his power, and seat, and great authority." He was set up by the devil, and supported by him to do his work, and promote his interest; and he lent him all the assistance he could.

Fifthly. A dangerous wound given him, and yet unexpectedly healed, ver. 3. Some think, by this wounded head, we are to understand the abolishing of pagan idolatry; and, by the healing of the wound, the introducing the popish idolatry; the same in substance with the former, only in a new dress, and which as effectually answers the devil's design as that did.

Sixthly. The honour and worship paid to this infernal monster; "All the world wondered after the beast." They all admired his power, and policy, and success, and they worshipped the dragon, that gave power to the beast; and they worshipped the beast. They paid honour and subjection to the devil and his instruments, and thought there was no power able to withstand them; so great was the darkness, degeneracy, and the madness of the world.

[There had been very recently a new election to the papedom. The announcement was made at the time from the window of the conclave of cardinals: 'I tell you tidings of great joy; a new pope is elected, Leo X.:' and the festivities began, on his coronation at St. Peter's, immediately after. But the grander ceremonial of his going to take possession of the church of his bishopric, St. John Lateran,—that church by the bishopric of which, as the mother and mistress of all churches, he is to be constituted not only bishop of Rome, but, by consequence, of the church universal,—was delayed for a month, to allow of the proper pomp attending it. And now the day is come for its celebration. The city is thronged with visitors on the occasion. Besides the hierarchy of Rome, there appear many of the independent princes of Italy; ambassadors, also, from most of the states of western Christendom; and, moreover, the episcopal and ecclesiastical deputies that have assembled to represent the church universal in the general council now holden at the Lateran.—The horses of the bishops and cardinals preceding him are covered from head to foot with white trappings. He comes forth himself, too, on a white horse; a cope of richest brocade mantling him; the ring of espousal with the universal church glittering on his right hand ring-finger; and on his head the regno, or imperial tiara of three crowns. A canopy is borne over him by the chief Roman authorities. The streets are strewn with tapestry and flowers for him to pass over. The welkin rings with acclamations of welcome. The multitudes fall on their knees, as he approaches, to receive his benediction. 'It seemed to me,' says the narrator of the pageant, 'that it was the Redeemer of mankind on the Palm Sunday going to Jerusalem; there being substituted only for "Hosannah to the Son of David!" the acclamation, "Viva papa leone!"—Life to the pope, the lion!'—In the triumphal arc, near the bridge of St. Angelo, there appear two lions, each with one foot on the papal insignia, to designate that it is the pope they symbolize, the other on the mundane globe, and with the legends, as the cry uttered by them, 'The prey is worthy of my glory,' and, 'To me the charge belongs.' With which last we may associate that in the Via Pontificum, where a pope sits enthroned, and two kings, having cast their crowns before him, kneel and worship. These a lion is represented as blandly licking and fondling. But on other two, that appear armed and hostile in the distance, another lion seems as about to spring, and the motto, 'Prostratis placidus, rebelibus ferox,' proclaims, as with lion's roar, that submission, implicit submission, is the law of this pontifical empire.—Elliott, vol. ii., p. 49-57, where see authorities.]

ROMISH MEDAL OF THE POPE AS LION OF THE TRIBE OF JUDAH.

Seventhly. How he exercised his infernal power and policy. He had a "mouth speaking great things and blasphemies." He blasphemed God, the name of God, the tabernacle of God, and all them that dwell in heaven; and he made war with the saints, and overcame them, and gained a sort of universal empire in the world. Observe, 1. His malice was principally levelled at the God of heaven and his heavenly attendants; at God, in making images of him that is invisible, and in worshipping them; at the tabernacle of God, that is, say some, at the human nature of the Lord Jesus Christ, in which God dwells as in a tabernacle; (this is dishonoured by their doctrine of transubstantiation, that will not suffer his body to be a true body, and will put it into the power of every priest to prepare a body for Christ); and against them that dwell in heaven, the glorified saints, by putting them into the place of the pagan demons; and praying to them, which they are so far from being pleased with, that they truly judge themselves wronged and dishonoured by it. Thus the malice of the devil shews itself against heaven and the blessed inhabitants of heaven. These are above the reach of his power; all he can do is to blaspheme them. But the saints on earth are more exposed to his cruelty, and he sometimes is permitted to triumph over them and trample upon them.

Eighthly. The limitation of the devil's power and success, and that both as to time and persons. 1. He is limited in point of time; his reign is to "continue forty and two months," ver. 5, suitable to the other prophetic characters of the reign of antichrist. 2. He is limited as to the persons and people that he shall entirely subject to his will and power; it will be only those whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life. Christ had a chosen remnant redeemed by his blood, recorded in his book, sealed by his Spirit; and though the devil and antichrist might overcome their bodily strength, and take away the natural life, they could never conquer their souls, nor prevail with them to forsake their Saviour and revolt to his enemies.

Ninthly. Here is a demand of attention to what is here discovered of the great sufferings and troubles of the church, and an assurance given, that when God has accomplished his work on Mount Zion, his refining work, then he will turn his hand against the enemies of his people; and they that have killed with the sword shall themselves fall by the sword, ver. 10; and they that led the people of God into captivity shall themselves be made captives. And here now is that which will be proper exercise for the patience and faith of the saints; patience under the prospect of so great sufferings, and faith in the prospect of so glorious a deliverance.

[St. John saw this beast rising out of the sea, but the Roman empire was risen and established long before St. John's time; and therefore this must be the Roman empire, not in its then present, but in some future, shape and form; and it arose in another shape and form, after it was broken in pieces by the incursions of the northern nations. The beast hath seven heads and ten horns, which are the well known marks and signals of the Roman empire; the seven heads alluding to the seven mountains whereon Rome was situated, and to the seven forms of government which successively prevailed there; and the ten horns signifying the ten kingdoms into which the Roman empire was divided. It is remarkable that the dragon had seven crowns upon his heads, but the beast hath upon his horns ten crowns; so that there had been in the meanwhile a revolution of power from the heads of the dragon to the horns of the beast, and the sovereignty, which before was exercised by Rome alone, was now transferred and divided among ten kingdoms; but the Roman empire was not divided into ten kingdoms till after it was become Christian. Although the heads had lost their crowns, yet they still retained the name of blasphemy. In all its heads, in all its forms of government, Rome was still guilty of idolatry and blasphemy. Imperial Rome was called, and delighted to be called, 1. The eternal city, the heavenly city, the goddess of the earth, the goddess; and had her temples and altars with incense and sacrifices offered up to her; and how the papal Rome likewise hath arrogated to herself Divine titles and honours, there will be a fitter occasion of shewing in the following part of this description. As Daniel's fourth beast (Dan. vii. 7) was without a name, and devoured and brake in pieces the three former, so this beast (ver. 2) is also without a name, and partakes of the nature and qualities of the three former, having the body of a leopard, which was the third beast, or Grecian empire, and the feet of a bear, which was the second beast, or Persian empire; and the mouth of a lion, which was the first beast, or Babylonian empire; and consequently this must be the same as Daniel's fourth beast, or the Roman empire. But still it is not the same beast, the same empire entirely, but with some variation. And, 2. The dragon gave him his power, divine, or 'his armies, and his seat,' thronos, or 'his imperial throne,' and great authority or jurisdiction over all the parts of his empire. The beast, therefore, is the successor and substitute of the dragon or of the idolatrous heathen Roman empire; and what other idolatrous power hath succeeded to the heathen emperors in Rome, all the world is a judge and a witness. The dragon, having failed in his purpose of restoring the old heathen idolatry, delegates his power to the beast, and thereby introduces a new species of idolatry, nominally different, but essentially the same,—the worship of angels and saints instead of the gods and demigods of antiquity. Another mark whereby the beast was peculiarly distinguished was "one of his heads as it were wounded to death," ver. 3.—Bishop Newton. Let us here avail ourselves of the aid of an interpreter who, we are sure, will not mislead us. In Rev. xvii. 9, 10, we are told the seven heads have a twofold signification: 1st. They symbolize the seven hills which were to be the seat of the government of the kingdom. We are farther informed that the seven heads also symbolize seven kings, that is, seven forms of government. Now, such is the number of distinct forms of government which the Roman empire has assumed from first to last—kings, consuls, dictators, decemvirs, military tribunes, emperors. Of these kings, or forms of governments, it was said, "Five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come." Five of these had fallen before the days of John; the sixth, namely, the imperial, was then in being; and the seventh was then future. It was intimated, "and when he" (the seventh head) "cometh, he must continue a short space." Who is this seventh head, whose term of existence was to be so brief? On no point are apocalyptic commentators more divided, or their conclusions more vague. Mede makes the seventh head the demi-Cesar, or western emperor. Bishop Newton thinks the dukedom of Rome, established after the conquest of the Heruli, is meant. Others suppose that the Christian emperors constituted the seventh head, and had its wound by the sword of the Heruli. Mr. Elliott finds the seventh head in the change of government that took place under Diocletian, who, together with his successors, in place of emperor or general of the Roman armies, became king or lord; and in place of the laurel, crown, and purple, assumed the diadem and robe of silk—the Asiatic symbols of absolute rule. This was followed by great and fundamental changes in the administration, and is marked by Gibbon as the "new form of administration." These are the nearest approaches which have been made to the solution of the difficulty of the seventh head, "And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death." This form of government was extinguished by the sword of the Goths. A new head was to arise in the room of that which was cut off; and this, though it should count only as the seventh, would in reality be the eighth; and under it the beast was to go into perdition: "he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition." Who is the eighth head? To this question an answer is given by the angel himself: "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not. And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth." From which we infer that the papacy is the eighth head. This is a singular and apparently contradictory account of the beast,—the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. How was it possible that both statements could be true,—that the beast had ceased to exist, and yet was in existence, that is, when it was the object of wonder to all who dwelt on the earth? And yet this account is perfectly consistent with fact. Pagan and imperial Rome had existed; but the Gothic invasion had brought its existence to an end, apparently for ever; but it rose again in its decem-regal state. It was the same empire in reality which existed now in the ten kingdoms, as had existed in its undivided form before the Gothic invasion. We have already shewn the identity of the seven-headed and the ten-horned beast of the abyss or sea with Daniel's fourth monarchy. But Daniel's fourth monarchy was the beast." Man without God becomes degraded to the level of the beasts that perish. The nobler capacities are neglected, the lower are cultivated, and the ascendancy of the lower is man's degradation. This is the lesson of the transformation of Nebuchadnezzar; pride and self-complacent boasting drove him forth among the beasts.

animals represent the base and greedy passions of men. (Compare Jer. v. 6.)

xiii. 3. "His deadly wound was healed:" or, with Alford, "the stroke of its death was healed."

xiii. 4. "The dragon which gave:" rather, "they worshipped the dragon because he gave."

Roman empire, and therefore the symbol before us is that of the Roman empire, which again reappeared. It had apparently been wounded to death; but it was resuscitated, and mainly through the papacy.—S. V. Gibbon says, 'Like Thebes, or Babylon, or Carthage, the name of Rome must have been erased from the earth, if the city had not been actuated by a vital principle which restored her to honour and dominion.' This vital principle he explains to be a tradition that two Jewish teachers, a tent-maker and a fisherman, had been executed at Rome, in the circus of Nero—that after five hundred years their genuine or fictitious relics were adored as the palladium of Rome—and that about this time the bishopric of Rome was filled by one of living energy, the first of the Gregories. And two writers, describing the time when the eighth head thus became Satan's compensation for the wounding and death of the seventh head, or paganism, that passed away, neither of them of great celebrity, thus write:—Augustin Steuchus: 'The empire having been overthrown, unless God had raised up the pontificate, Rome would have become uninhabitable.' Blondus writes: 'The princes of the world now adore and worship as perpetual dictators the successors, not of Caesar, but of the fisherman Peter, that is, the supreme pontiff, the substitute of the afore-mentioned emperor.' And Muller, the celebrated German historian, gives a confirmation of the Apocalypse, when he remarks, 'With the exception of the papacy, these ten kingdoms had no other point of union.'—A. S.]

11 And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth; and he had two horns like a lamb, and he spake as a dragon. 12 And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and causeth the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed. 13 And he doeth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men, 14 And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast, which had the wound by a sword, and did live. 15 And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed. 16 And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads: 17 And that no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name. 18 Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred threescore and six.

Those that think the first beast signifies Rome pagan, by this second beast would understand Rome papal, that does promote idolatry and tyranny, but in a more soft and lamb-like manner. Those that understand the first beast of the secular power of the papacy take the second to intend its spiritual and ecclesiastical powers, which act under the disguise of religion and charity to the souls of men. Here observe,

First. The form and shape of this second beast; "He had two horns like a lamb," but a mouth that spake like the dragon. All agree this must be some great impostor, that under a pretence of religion shall deceive the souls of men. The papists would have it to be Apollonius Tyanæus; but Dr. More has rejected that opinion, and fixes it upon the ecclesiastical powers of the papacy. The pope shews the horns of a lamb, pretends to be the vicar of Christ upon earth, and so to be vested with his power and authority; but his speech betrays him; for he gives forth those false doctrines and cruel decrees as shew him to belong to the dragon, and not to the lamb. [Among the different flags of all the kingdoms of the world, as may be seen by referring to Danville's atlas, on the edge of a map there is one,—a lamb at the foot of the cross, thus:—]

Secondly. The power which he exerciseth; all the power of the former beast, ver. 12. He promotes the same interest, pursues the same design in substance, which is, to draw men off from worshipping the true God, to worship those that by nature are no gods, and subject the souls and consciences of men to the will and authority of men, in opposition to the will of God. This design is promoted by popery as well as by paganism, and by the crafty arts of popery as well as by the secular arm; both serving the interests of the devil, though in a different manner.

Thirdly. The methods by which this second beast carried on his interests and designs; and they are of three sorts: 1. Lying wonders, pretended miracles, by which they should be deceived, and prevailed with to worship the former beast in this new image or shape that was now made for him. They would pretend to bring down fire from heaven, as Elias did. And God sometimes permits his enemies, as he did the magicians of Egypt, to do things that seem very wonderful, and by which unwary persons may be deluded. It is well known the papal kingdom has been long supported by pretended miracles. 2. Excommunications, anathemas, severe censures, by which they pretend to cut men off from Christ, and cast them into the power of the devil, but do indeed deliver them over to the secular power, that they may be put to death. And thus, notwithstanding their vile hypocrisy, they are justly charged with killing those that they cannot corrupt. 3. By disfranchisement; allowing none to enjoy natural, civil, or municipal rights, that will not worship that papal beast, that is, the image of the pagan beast. It is made a qualification for buying and selling the rights of nature, as well as for places of profit and trust, that they have the mark of the beast in their forehead, and in their right hand, and that they have the name of the beast and the number of his name. It is probable the mark, the name, and the number of the beast, may all signify the same thing, that they make an open profession of their subjection and obedience to the papacy, which is receiving the mark in their forehead, and that they oblige themselves to use all their interest, power, and endeavour to promote the papal authority, which is receiving the mark in their right hands. We are told, Pope Martyn V., in his bull added to the Council of Constance, prohibits Roman Catholics to suffer any heretics to dwell in their countries, or to make any bargains, use any trades, or bear any civil offices; which is a very clear interpretation of this prophecy.

Fourthly. We have here the number of the beast in such a manner given as shews the infinite wisdom of God, and will sufficiently exercise all the wisdom and accuracy of men; the number is, "the number of a man," computed after the usual manner among men, and it is 666. Whether this be the number of the errors and heresies that are contained in popery, or, rather, as others, the number of the years from its rise to its fall, is not certain, much less what that period is which is described by these prophetic numbers. The most admired dissertation on this intricate subject is that of Dr. Potter, where the curious may find sufficient entertainment. It seems to me to be one of those seasons which God has reserved in his own power. Only this we know, God has written Mene, Tekel, upon all his enemies; he has numbered their days, and they shall be finished; but his own kingdom shall endure for ever.

[Mention having been made of the number of the beast, or the number of his name, (for they are both the same), the prophet proceeds to inform us what that number is, leaving us from the number to collect the name; ver. 18, "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast." It is not, therefore, a vain and ridiculous attempt to search into this mystery, but, on the contrary, is recommended to us upon the authority of an apostle. For "it is the number of a man;" it is a method of numbering practised among men; as the measure of a man (ch. xxi. 17) is such a measure as men commonly make use of in measuring. It was a method practised among the ancients, to denote names by numbers; as the name of Thouth, or the Egyptian Mercury, was signified by the number 1218. St. Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul, in his epistle discovers in like manner the name of Jesus crucified in the number 318; and other instances might be produced if there was occasion. It hath been the usual method in all God's dispensations, for the Holy Spirit to accommodate his expressions to the customs, fashions, and manners of the several ages. Since, then, this art and mystery of numbers was so much used among the ancients, it is less wonderful that the beast also should have his number, and his number is 666. No name appears more proper and suitable than that famous one mentioned by Irenæus, who lived not long after St. John's time, and was the disciple of Polycarp, the disciple of John. He saith that "the name Latineus contains the number of 666; and it is very likely, because the last kingdom is so called, for they are Latins who now reign; but in this we will not glory;" that is, as it becomes a modest and pious man in a point of such difficulty, he will not be too confident of his explication. After the division of the empire, the Greeks and other Orientalists called the people of the western church, or church of Rome, Latins; and as Dr. Henry Moore expresseth it, they Latinize in every thing,—mass, prayers, hymns, litanies, canons, decretals, bulls, are conceived in Latin. The papal councils speak in Latin. Women themselves pray in Latin. Nor is the Scripture read in any other language under popery than Latin. Wherefore the council of Trent commanded the vulgar Latin to be the only authentic version. Nor do their doctors doubt to prefer it to the Hebrew and Greek text itself, which was written by the prophets and apostles. In short, all things are Latin; the pope having communicated his language to the people under his dominion, as the mark and character of his empire. They themselves, indeed, chose rather to be called Romans, and more absurdly still, Roman Catholic; and probably the apostle, as he hath made use of some Hebrew names in this book, as Abaddon (ch. xi. 11) and Armageddon (ch. xvi. 16), so might in this place likewise allude to the name in the Hebrew language. Now Romith is the Hebrew name for the Roman beast, or Roman kingdom; and this word, as well as the former word Latineus, contains the just and exact number, 666.

It is really surprising that there should be such a fatal coincidence in both names in both languages. Mr. Pyle asserts, and I believe he may assert very truly, that "no other word in any language whatever can be found to express both the same number and the same thing."—Bishop Newton.

We are told, says Dr. Chalmers, of another, or second, or representative power, subordinate to the primary one, and helpful in confirming his ascendancy over the spirits of men. The plausibilities which are to mislead those of our own land might not issue as before from the monasteries and charitable xiii. 10. Alford's rendering of this verse is, "If any is for captivity, into captivity he goeth; if any to be slain with the sword, he must be slain with the sword. Here is," &c. According to the English version, the words are a warning to persecutors, like that of our Lord, "He that taketh the sword shall perish with the sword." But the verse really inculcates patience and submission on the part of the persecuted; even the oppressed have the consolation of knowing that their trials are apportioned by a wise Providence.

xiii. 18. "Count:" Alford has "calculate." The number is given in one MS. as six hundred and sixteen. The variation of reading was mentioned by Irenæus as early as the second century.

institutes of the middle ages; but we have talking senators now, and their underlings, who would confound every distinction between truth and error—calling evil good, and good evil, and who would lull us into the delusion that there is no danger to be apprehended from the insidious and ever-plotting Jesuitism that is now every where at work. They might even deceive us by the marvellous results of their civilizing and educational processes. But let us not be deceived; and at the hazard of forfeiting all civil advantages, nay, even life itself, let us be enabled to stand up for the paramount claims of that knowledge which alone can sanctify and save, even the knowledge of the one Mediator between God and man, and to whom all power has been given in heaven and earth. Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.—Posthumous Works, vol. iv.]

CHAPTER XIV.

After an account of the great trials and sufferings which the servants of God had endured, we have now a more pleasant scene opening: the day begins now to dawn. And here we have represented, I. The Lord Jesus at the head of his faithful followers, ver. 1—5. II. Three angels sent successively to proclaim the fall of Babylon, and the things antecedent and consequent to so great an event, ver. 6—12. III. The vision of the harvest, ver. 13 to the end.

AND I looked, and, lo, a Lamb stood on the mount Sion, and with him an hundred forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads. 2 And I heard a voice from heaven, as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps: 3 And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elders: and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand, which were redeemed from the earth. 4 These are they which were not defiled with women; for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the firstfruits unto God and to the Lamb. 5 And in their mouth was found no guile: for they are without fault before the throne of God.

Here we have one of the most pleasant sights that can be viewed in this world, the Lord Jesus Christ at the head of his faithful adherents and attendants. Where observe,

First. How Christ appears; as a lamb standing upon Mount Sion. Mount Sion is the gospel church; Christ is with his church, and in the midst of her in all her troubles, and therefore she is not consumed. It is his presence that secures her perseverance. He appears as a Lamb, a true Lamb, the Lamb of God. There was a counterfeit lamb rose out of the earth in the last chapter, but was really a dragon. Here Christ appears as the true paschal Lamb, to shew that his mediatorial government is the fruit of his sufferings, and the cause of his people's safety and fidelity.

Secondly. How his people appear; very honourably. 1. As to the numbers; they are many, even all that were sealed; not one of them lost in all the tribulations through which they had gone. 2. Their distinguishing badge; they had the name of God written in their foreheads. They made a bold and open profession of their faith in God and Christ; and this being followed by suitable actions, they are known and approved. 3. Their congratulations and songs of praise, which were peculiar to the redeemed, ver. 3. Their praises were loud as the thunder, or as the voice of many waters; they were melodious, as of harpers; they were heavenly, before the throne of God. The song was new, suited to the new covenant, and unto that new and gracious dispensation of providence under which they now were. And their song was a secret to others; strangers intermeddled not with their joy. Others might repeat the words of the song, but they were strangers to the true sense and spirit of it. 4. Their character and description. 1st. They are described by their chastity and purity. They were virgins; they had not defiled themselves either with corporal or spiritual adultery. They had kept themselves clean from the abominations of the antichristian generation. 2nd. By their loyalty and steadfast adherence to Christ; they "follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." They follow the conduct of his word, Spirit, and providence, leaving it to him to lead them into what duties and difficulties he pleases. 3rd. By their former designation to this honour; "These were redeemed from among men, being the first-fruits to God and to the Lamb," ver. 4. Here is plain evidence of a special redemption, "they were redeemed from among men." Some of the children of men are, by redeeming mercy, distinguished from others; they were the "first-fruits unto God and to the Lamb"; his choice ones, eminent in every grace, and the earnest of many more that should be followers of them, as they were of Christ. 4th. By their universal integrity and conscientiousness. There was no guile found in them, and they were "without fault before the throne of God"; they were without any prevailing guile, any allowed fault, their hearts were right with God; and as for their human infirmities, they were freely pardoned in Christ. This is the happy remnant who attend upon the Lord Jesus as their Head and Lord; he is glorified in them, and they in him.

their foreheads." (Compare John xvii. 3.) The redeemed here pictured are called by Auberlen "the Divine kernel of humanity, the positive fruits of the history of the world and the Church."

xiv. 2. "I heard the voice of harpers:" here Alford renders, "And the voice which I heard was as of harpers," &c.

xiv. 4. "These were redeemed," &c.: both here and in verse 3 Alford substitutes the word "purchased" for "redeemed." "These were purchased from among men as a firstfruit unto God," &c.

6 And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, 7 Saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters. 8 And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication. 9 And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead, or in his hand, 10 The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: 11 And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name. 12 Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus.

In this part of the chapter we have three angels or messengers sent from heaven, to give notice of the fall of Babylon, and of those things that were antecedent and consequent to that great event.

First. The first angel was sent on an errand antecedent to it, and that was, to "preach the everlasting Gospel," ver. 6, 7. Observe, 1. The Gospel is an everlasting Gospel; it is so in its nature, and shall be so in its consequences. Though all flesh be grass, "the word of the Lord endureth for ever." 2. It is a work fit for an angel to preach this everlasting Gospel. Such is the dignity, and such the difficulty, of that work; and yet we have this treasure in earthen vessels. 3. That the everlasting Gospel is of great concern to all the world; and as it is the concern of all, it is very much to be desired that it should be made known to all, even "to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people." 4. That the Gospel is the great means whereby men are brought to fear God and to give glory to him. Natural religion is not sufficient to keep up the fear of God, nor to secure to him glory from men. It is the Gospel that revives the fear of God, and retrieves his glory in the world. 5. When idolatry creeps into the churches of God, it is by the preaching of the Gospel, attended by the power of the Holy Spirit, that men are turned from idols to serve the living God, as the Creator of the "heaven, and the earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters," ver. 7. To worship any God besides him that created the world is idolatry.

Secondly. The second angel follows the other, and proclaims the actual fall of Babylon. The preaching of the everlasting Gospel had shaken the foundations of antichristianism in the world, and hastened its downfall. By Babylon is generally understood Rome, which was before called Sodom and Egypt, for wickedness and cruelty, and is now first called Babylon, for her pride and idolatry. Observe, 1. What God has foreordained and foretold shall be done as certainly as if it were done already. 2. The greatness of the papal Babylon will not be able to prevent her fall, but will make it more dreadful and remarkable. 4. The wickedness of Babylon, in corrupting, debauching, and intoxicating the nations round about her, will make her fall just, and will declare the righteousness of God in her utter ruin, ver. 8. Her crimes are recited as the just cause of her destruction.

Thirdly. A third angel follows the other two, and gives warning to all of that Divine vengeance which would overtake all those that obstinately adhered to the antichristian interest, after God had thus proclaimed its downfall, ver. 9, 10. If, after this, (this threatening denounced against Babylon, and in part already executed,) any should persist in their idolatry, professing subjection to the beast and promoting his cause, they must expect to drink deep "of the wine of the wrath of God." They shall be for ever miserable in soul and body; Jesus Christ shall inflict this punishment upon them, and the holy angels shall behold it and approve of it. Idolatry, both pagan and papist, is a damning sin in its own nature, and will prove fatal to those that persist in it after fair warning given by the word of Providence. They that refuse to come out of Babylon when thus called, and resolve to partake of her sins, must receive of her plagues. And the guilt and ruin of such incorrigible idolaters will serve to set forth the excellency of the patience and obedience of the saints. These graces shall be rewarded with salvation and glory. When the treachery and rebellion of others shall be punished with everlasting destruction, then it will be said, to the honour of the faithful, "Here is the patience of the saints," ver. 12. You have before seen their patience exercised, now you see it rewarded.

[It is generally admitted by the best interpreters that the three angels introduced in these and the following verses were emblematical heralds of the progressive reformation from popery. When, therefore, the extent and prevalence of the power of the beast at its full height had been predicted in the foregoing chapter, the diminution and weakening of it, as introductory to his destruction, is intimated in this. It is also worthy of notice, that about this era the opinion began to be publicly avowed by several persons, that the church, court, and city of Rome were Babylon, and so inevitably doomed to destruction. It may also be very well worth inquiring whether there are not some remains of the papal xiv. 8. "Babylon:" according to the oldest MSS. we should read, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, which hath made," &c.

xiv. 13. "Blessed . . . from henceforth:" "They who die during this period are represented as dying happy, in peace, as having seen the salvation of the Lord, the day of the Church's deliverance from persecution and apostasy, the day of Gospel light and glory" (Webster and Wilkinson). "For they rest," Alford renders "that they may rest from their labours."

superstition and corruption, even in Protestant churches; and how far they, whose grand object it seems to be to contend most, and most vehemently, not to say virulently, for that which admits of the least scriptural proof, keep at a proper distance from this tremendous warning.—T. Scott.]

13 And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them. 14 And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the Son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. 15 And another angel came out of the temple, crying with a loud voice to him that sat on the cloud, Thrust in thy sickle, and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe. 16 And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped. 17 And another angel came out of the temple which is in heaven, he also having a sharp sickle. 18 And another angel came out from the altar, which had power over fire; and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle, saying, Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe. 19 And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast it into the great winepress of the wrath of God. 20 And the winepress was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the winepress, even unto the horse bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

Here we have the vision of the harvest and vintage, introduced with a solemn preface. Observe,

First. The preface, ver. 13. Where note, 1. From whence this prophecy about the harvest came; it came down from heaven, and not from men, and therefore it is as certain truth, and great authority. 2. How it was to be preserved and published; by writing. It was to be matter of record that the people of God might have recourse to it for their support and comfort upon all occasions. 3. What it principally intended; and that is, to shew the blessedness of all the faithful saints and servants of God, both in death and after death. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth," &c. Where observe, 1st. The description of those that are and shall be blessed; such as die in the Lord, either die in the cause of Christ, or rather die in a state of vital union with Christ; that are found in Christ when death comes. 2nd. The demonstration of their blessedness; "they rest from their labours," and "their works follow them." First. They are blessed in their rest; they rest from all sin, temptation, sorrow, and persecution; "There the wicked cease from troubling, there the weary are at rest." Secondly. They are blessed in their recompence, "their works follow them;" they do not go before them as their title, or price of purchase, but follow them as their evidence of having lived and died in the Lord; and the memory of them will be pleasant, and the reward glorious, far above the merit of all their services and sufferings. Thirdly. They are happy in the time of their dying, when they have lived to see the cause of God reviving, the peace of the church returning, and the wrath of God falling upon their idolatrous, cruel enemies. Such times are good times to die in; they have Simeon's desire, "Now, Lord, let thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." And all this is ratified and confirmed by the testimony of the Spirit, witnessing with their spirits, and with the written word.

Secondly. We have the vision itself, represented by a harvest and a vintage. 1. By an harvest, ver. 14, 15; an emblem that sometimes signifies the cutting down of the wicked, when ripe for ruin, by the judgments of God; and sometimes the gathering in of the righteous, when ripe for heaven, by the mercy of God. This seems rather to represent God's judgments against the wicked. And here observe, 1st. The Lord of the harvest, one so like unto the Son of man, that he was the same, even the Lord Jesus; who is described, First. By the chariot, in which he saw a white cloud, a cloud that had a bright side turned to the church, how dark soever it might be to the wicked. Secondly. By the ensign of his power; on his head was a golden crown, authority to do all that he did, and whatsoever he would do. Thirdly. By the instrument of his providence; "in his hand a sharp sickle." Fourthly. By the solicitations he had from the temple to perform this great work. What he did, he was desired to do by his people; and though he was resolved to do it, he would for this thing be sought unto by them, and so it should be in return to their prayers. 2nd. Observe, The harvest work; which is, to thrust the sickle into the corn, and reap the field. The sickle is the sword of God's justice, the field is the world; reaping is cutting the inhabitants of the earth down, and carrying them off. 3rd. The harvest time, and that was when the corn is ripe; when the measure of the sins of men is filled up, and they are ripe for destruction. The most inveterate enemies of Christ and his church are not destroyed, till by their sin they are ripe for ruin, and then he will spare them no longer; he will thrust in his sickle, and the earth shall be reaped.

2. A vintage, ver. 17. Some think these two are only different emblems of the same judgment; others, that they refer to distinct events of Providence before the end of all things. Observe, 1st. To whom this vintage work was committed; to an angel, "another angel that came out from the altar;" that is, from the holiest of all in heaven. 2nd. At whose request this vintage work was undertaken; and it was as before, at the cry of an angel out of the temple, the ministers and churches of God on earth. 3rd. The work of the vintage, which consists of two parts: First. The cutting off and gathering the "clusters of the vine," which were now ripe and ready, "fully ripe," ver. 18. Secondly. Casting these grapes into the wine-press, ver. 19. And here we are told, 1st. What was the wine-press; it was "the wrath of God," the fire of his indignation, some terrible calamity, very probably the sword, shedding the blood of the wicked. 2nd. Where was the place of the wine-press; "without the city," where the army lay that came against Babylon. 3rd. The quantity of the wine; that is, of the blood that was drawn forth by this judgment; it was for depth up to the horses bridles, and for breadth and length "a thousand and six hundred furlongs," ver. 20; that is, say some, two hundred Italian miles, which is thought to be the measure of the Holy Land, and may be meant of the patrimony of the holy see, encompassing the city of Rome. But here we are left to doubtful conjectures. Perhaps this great event has not yet had its accomplishment, but the vision is for an appointed time; and therefore, though it may seem to tarry, we are to wait for it. "But who shall live when the Lord does this?"

CHAPTER XV.

Hitherto, according to the judgment of very eminent expositors, God had represented to his servant John, I. The state of the church under the pagan powers, in the six seals opened; and then, II. The state of the church under the papal powers, in the vision of the six trumpets that began to sound upon the opening of the seventh seal. III. And then is inserted a more general and brief account of the past, present, and future state of the church, in the little book, &c. He now proceeds, IV. To shew him how antichrist should be destroyed, by what steps that destruction should be accomplished, in the vision of the seven vials. This chapter contains an awful introduction or preparation for the pouring out of the vials; in which we have, 1. A sight of those angels in heaven that were to have the execution of this great work, and with what acclamations of joy the heavenly hosts applauded the great design, ver. 1—4. 2. A sight of these angels coming out of heaven to receive those vials which they were to pour out, and the great commotions that this caused in the world, ver. 5 to the end.

ND I saw another sign in heaven, great and marvellous, seven angels having the seven last plagues; for in them is filled up the wrath of God. 2 And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. 3 And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. 4 Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest.

Here we have the preparation of matters for the pouring out of the seven vials, which was committed to seven angels; and observe how these angels appeared to the apostle—"in heaven." It was in a wonderful manner, and that upon the account, 1. Of the work they had to do, and that was, to finish the destruction of antichrist. God was now about to pour out his seven last plagues upon that interest; and as the measure of Babylon's sins was filled up, they should now find the full measure of his vindictive wrath. 2. The spectators and witnesses of this their commission, all that had gotten the victory over the beast, &c. These stood on a sea of glass, representing this world, as some think, a brittle thing, that shall be broken to pieces; or, as others, the gospel covenant, alluding to the brazen sea in the temple, in which the priests were to wash (the faithful servants of God stand upon the foundation of the righteousness of Christ); or, as others, the Red Sea, that stood, as it were, congealed while the Israelites went through; and the pillar of fire reflecting light upon the waters, they would seem to have fire mingled with them; and this to shew that the fire of God's wrath against Pharaoh and his horses should dissolve the congealed waters, and destroy them thereby, to which there seems to be an allusion by their singing the song of Moses; in which, 1st. They extol the greatness of God's works, and the justice and truth of his ways, both in delivering his people and destroying their enemies; they rejoiced in hope, and the near prospect they had of this, though it was not yet accomplished. 2nd. They call upon all nations to render unto God that fear, glory, and worship which was due to such a discovery of his truth and justice; ver. 4, "Who shall not fear thee?"

5 And after that I looked, and, behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened: 6 And the seven angels came out of the temple, having the seven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breasts girded with mingled elements of water and fire seem to point to the twofold baptism of the saved—viz., the baptism of water and of the Spirit (John iii. 5) of all who are made kings and priests of the heavenly temple, and the baptism of fire through which all who are followers of the Lamb must pass. (Compare Luke iii. 16, xii. 49, 50; Mark x. 38—40; 1 Cor. iii. 13.) The words "and over his mark" are omitted by all the ancient MSS.

xv. 3. "Thou King of saints:" this reading has no authority

xiv. 20. "Without the city:" the largest wine-presses were usually outside the city. Blood and wine are sometimes used interchangeably. (Compare Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14; Ps. lxxv. 8; Isa. xxix. 9, li. 21.)

xv. 1. "The seven last plagues:" Alford's rendering is more emphatic—"seven plagues which are the last."

xv. 2. "Sea of glass mingled with fire:" besides the allusion to the brazen laver of the Temple for the purification of the priests, the golden girdles. 7 And one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever. 8 And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.

Observe, First. How these angels appeared coming out of heaven, to execute their commission; ver. 5. "The temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened." Here is an allusion to the holiest of all in the tabernacle and temple, where was the mercy-seat, covering the ark of the testimony, where the high priest made intercession, and God communed with his people, and heard their prayers. Now by this, as it is here mentioned, we may understand, 1. That, in the judgments God was now about to execute upon the antichristian interest, he was fulfilling the prophecies and promises of his word and covenant, which was there always before him, and of which he was ever mindful. 2. That in this work he was answering the prayers of the people, which were offered to him by their great High Priest. 3. That he was herein avenging the quarrel of his own Son, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, whose offices and authority had been usurped, his name dishonoured, and the great designs of his death opposed by antichrist and his adherents. 4. That he was opening a wider door of liberty for his people to worship him in numerous solemn assemblies, without the fear of their enemies.

Secondly. How they were equipped and prepared for their work. Where observe, 1. Their array. They were "clothed in pure and white linen," and had "their breasts girded with golden girdles," ver. 6. This was the habit of the high priests when they went in to inquire of God, and came out with an answer from him. This shewed these angels were acting in all things under the Divine appointment and direction, and that they were going to prepare a sacrifice to the Lord, called "the supper of the great God," ch. xix. 17. The angels are the ministers of Divine justice, and they do every thing in a pure and holy manner. 2. Their artillery; what it was, and from whence they received it. Their artillery, by which they were to do this great execution, was, "seven vials filled with the wrath of God." They were armed with the wrath of God against his enemies. The meanest creature, when it comes armed with the anger of God, will be too hard for any man in the world; but much more an angel of God. This wrath of God was not to be poured out all at once, but was divided into seven parts, which should successively fall upon the antichristian party. Now from whence did the angels receive these vials? From one of the four living creatures, one of the ministers of the true church; that is, in answer to the prayers of the ministers and people of God, and to avenge their cause, in which the angels are willingly employed.

Thirdly. The impressions these things made upon all that stood near the temple; they were all, as it were, wrapt up in clouds of smoke, which filled the temple, from the glorious and powerful presence of God; so that "no man was able to enter into the temple" till the work was finished. The interests of antichrist were so interwoven with the civil interests of the nations, that he could not be destroyed without giving a great shock to all the world. And the people of God would have but little rest and leisure to assemble themselves before him, while this great work was a doing; for the present their sabbaths would be interrupted, ordinances of public worship intermitted, and all thrown into a general confusion. God himself was now preaching to the church, and to all the world, by terrible things in righteousness; but when this work was done, then the churches would have rest; the temple would be opened, and the solemn assemblies gathered, edified, and multiplied. The greatest deliverances of the church are brought about by awful and astonishing steps of Providence.

[Contemporaneously with the French Revolution, (see Supplementary Note on following chapter,) or immediately subsequent, there was a signal revival of the evangelic and missionary spirit in Britain. Numerous societies were formed for the spread of the Gospel and the circulation of the Scriptures. Missions were set on foot to almost all parts of the world,—the West Indies, the South Sea Islands, Africa, Australia, Greenland. The evangelization of India was a work not too mighty to be undertaken. The Jews were visited; and even the benighted and idolatrous churches of eastern and western Christendom were not neglected. The French Revolution opened great part of Europe to the preaching of the Gospel. Thus the temple was opened; and the ark of the Testament—ch. xi. 15–19—the Bible and Gospel,—which popery had veiled, was anew discovered to the Roman nations. But this statement must be taken in connection with another most important intimation, in the end of ch. xv., respecting the temple now open: "And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; and no man was able to enter into the temple till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled." Till God had vindicated his holiness by the infliction of these awful plagues, no man was able to enter into the temple. Nevertheless, all the while the storm was raging, it stood open, revealing, as it were, to the nations the sanctuary of safety, and the temple of worship, where they should ultimately be gathered. Since evangelic agencies began to be employed on the continent of Europe there have been individual conversions not a few; but there has been no general or national evangelization; nor are we to expect that there will be, till the judgment of the seventh vial is ended.—S. V. It is also highly probable that the same judgments by which the antichristian power and other enemies of the church shall be destroyed will be employed to purify even the less corrupt parts of it, and in proportion to the degree in which unscriptural usages are contended for and imposed, or scriptural truths and duties are neglected, even professed Protestant churches will drink of the same cup, Isa. v. 9; i. 21. "God will purify his church by such signal judgments as shall arouse the attention of the whole world."—Bishop Horsley. So that the happy estate of the true church, as perhaps implied by entering into the temple, will not commence till, by the same awful dispensations, obstinate enemies shall be destroyed, and lukewarm, superstitious, or formal Christians shall be purified. Thus, whatever is anti-scriptural or unscriptural in every company being purged away, the whole brought to purity, unity, and spirituality in worship, discipline, doctrine, and practice, shall be firmly established, Zeph. iii. 9–17.—T. Scott.

CHAPTER XVI.

In this chapter we have an account of the pouring forth of these vials that were filled with the wrath of God, and they were poured out upon the whole antichristian empire, and on every thing appertaining to it. 1. Upon the earth, ver. 2. Then, 11. Upon the sea, ver. 3. 111. Upon the rivers and fountains of waters, ver. 4. Here the heavenly hosts proclaim and applaud the righteousness of the judgments of God. IV. The fourth vial was poured out on the sun, ver. 8. V. The fifth on the seat of the beast. VI. The sixth on the river Euphrates. VII. The seventh in the air, upon which the cities of the nations fell, and great Babylon came in remembrance before God.

ND I heard a great voice out of the temple saying to the seven angels, Go your ways, and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth. 2 And the first went, and poured out his vial upon the earth; and there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image. 3 And the second angel poured out his vial upon the sea; and it became as the blood of a dead man: and every living soul died in the sea. 4 And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of waters; and they became blood. 5 And I heard the angel of the waters say, Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus. 6 For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy. 7 And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God Almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

We had in the foregoing chapter the great and solemn preparation that was made for the pouring out of the vials; now we have the performance of that work. Where observe,

First. That though every thing was made ready before, yet nothing was to be put in execution without an immediate, positive order from God; and this he gave out of the temple, answering the prayers of his people, and avenging their quarrel.

Secondly. No sooner was the word of command given but it was immediately obeyed; no delay, no objection made. We find some of the best of men, as Moses and Jeremiah, did not so readily come in and comply with the call of God to their work; but the angels of God not only excel in strength, but in a readiness to do the will of God. God says, "Go your ways, and pour out the vials," and immediately the work is begun. We are taught to pray, that the will of God may be done on earth as it is done in heaven.

And now we enter upon a series of very terrible dispensations of Providence; of which it is difficult to give the certain meaning, or to make the particular application. But in the general it is worth our observation,

1. That here is a reference and allusion to several of the plagues of Egypt, such as the turning their waters into blood, smiting them with boils and sores. Their sins were alike, and so were their punishments.

2. These vials have a plain reference to the seven trumpets, which represented the rise of antichrist; and we learn hence, that the fall of the church's enemies shall bear some resemblance to their rise; and that God can bring them down in such ways as they chose to exalt themselves. And the fall of antichrist shall be gradual; as Rome was not built in one day, so neither shall it fall in one day, but it falls by degrees: it shall fall so as to rise no more.

3. The fall of the antichristian interest should be universal. Every thing that any ways belonged to them, or could be serviceable to them,—the premises and all their appurtenances,—are put into the writ for destruction; their earth, their air, their sea, their rivers, their cities, all consigned over to ruin, all accursed for the sake of the wickedness of that people. Thus the creation groans and suffers through the sins of men. Now we proceed to,

1st. The first angel who poured out his vial, ver. 2; and observe, First. Where it fell; "Upon the earth;" that is, say some, upon the common people; others, upon the body of the Romish clergy, that were the basis of the papacy, and of an earthly spirit, all carrying on earthly designs. Secondly. What it produced: "Noisome and grievous sores" on all that had the mark of the beast. They had marked themselves by their sin, now God marks them out by his judgments. This sore, some think, signifies some of the first appearances of Providence against their state and interest, which gave them great uneasiness, as it discovered their inward distemper, and was a token of farther evil: the plague-tokens appeared.

2nd. "The second angel poured out his vial;" and here we see, First. Where it fell; "Upon the sea;" that is, say some, upon the jurisdiction and dominion of the papacy; others, upon the whole system of their religion, their false doctrines, corrupt glosses, their superstitious rites, their idolatrous worship, their pardons, indulgences, a great conflux of wicked inventions and institutions, by which they maintain a trade and traffic advantageous to themselves, but injurious to all that deal with them. Secondly. What it produced: It turned the sea into blood, "as the blood of a dead man, and every living soul died in the sea." God discovered not only the vanity and falsehood of their religion, but the pernicious and deadly nature of it, that the souls of men were poisoned by that which was pretended to be the sure means of their salvation.

3rd. The next angel poured out his vial; and we are told, First. Where that fell; "Upon the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters;" that is, say some very learned men, upon their emissaries, and especially the Jesuits, who, like streams, conveyed the venom and poison of their errors and idolatries from the spring-head through the earth. Secondly. What effect it had upon them; it from the best MSS. The majority of ancient MSS. have "thou King of the nations;" one, the Parisian MS., has "King of the ages."

xv. 4. "Judgments are manifest." Alford renders, "because thy righteous acts have been made manifest." The whole progress of history is to declare God's righteousness; this righteousness the Gospel declares in love (Rom. iii. 25, 26), while history from age to age unfolds it in operation, for history read aright is little more than the perpetual proclamation of the moral laws of the righteous King of the ages.

xv. 6. "Clothed in pure and white linen;" or better, "clothed in linen pure and shining." (Compare Transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 2.)

xvi. 1. "As Moses took ashes from an earthly, common furnace, so angels, as priestly ministers in the heavenly temple, take holy fire in sacred vials, or bowls, from the heavenly altar to pour down, (Compare chap. viii. 5.) The same heavenly altar which would have turned them into blood; some think, it stirred up Christian princes to take just revenge upon them that had been the great incendiaries of the world, and had occasioned the shedding of the blood of armies, and of martyrs; and the following doxology favours this sense, ver. 5, 6, wherein the instrument that God makes use of in this work is called "the angel of the waters," who extols the righteousness of God in this retaliation, "They have shed the blood of thy saints, and thou hast given them blood to drink, for they are worthy;" to which another angel answered by full consent, ver. 7.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial upon the sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with fire. 9 And men were scorched with great heat, and blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: and they repented not to give him glory. 10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast; and his kingdom was full of darkness; and they gnawed their tongues for pain, 11 And blasphemed the God of heaven because of their pains and their sores, and repented not of their deeds.

4th. The fourth angel poured out his vial, and that fell upon the sun; that is, say some, upon some eminent prince of the popish communion that should renounce their false religion a little while before its utter downfall; and some expect it will be the German emperor. And now, what will be the consequence of this? That sun, which before cherished them with warm and benign influences, shall now grow hot against these idolaters, and shall scorch them. Princes shall use their power and authority to suppress them, which yet would be so far from bringing them to repentance, that it should cause them to curse God and their king, and look upward, throwing out their blasphemous speeches against the God of heaven. They were hardened to their ruin.

5th. The fifth angel poured out his vial, ver. 10; and observe, First. Where that fell: "Upon the seat of the beast;" upon Rome itself, the mystical Babylon, the head of the antichristian empire. Secondly. What effect it had there: the whole kingdom of the beast was "full of darkness" and distress; from that very city, which was the seat of their policy, the source of all their learning, and all their knowledge, and all their pomp and pleasure, it now becomes a source of darkness, and pain, and anguish. Darkness was one of the plagues of Egypt, and it is opposed to lustre and honour, and so forebodes the contempt and scorn to which the antichristian interest should be exposed. Darkness is opposed to wisdom and penetration, and forebodes the confusion and folly which the idolaters should discover at that time. It is opposed to pleasure and joy, and so signifies their anguish and vexation of spirit when their calamities thus came upon them.

[In The Discourse of the Rise and Fall of Papacy, published by its author in the year 1701, it is said, "The pouring out of this vial on the sun must denote the humiliation of some eminent potentates of the Romish interest, whose influence and countenance cherish and support the papal cause. And these, therefore, must be principally understood of the house of Austria and Bourbon, though not exclusively of other popish princes.—I cannot but hope that some new mortification of the chief supporters of antichrist will then happen; and perhaps the French monarchy may begin to be considerably humble about that time; that whereas the French king takes the sun for his emblem, and this for his motto, Nec pluribus impar, he may at length, or rather his successors, and the monarchy itself, (at least before the year 1794,) be forced to acknowledge, that (in respect to neighbouring potentates) he is even singulis impar."—Rev. R. Fleming, 1701. We leave the reader to trace the singular coincidence between these intimations and the actual occurrences of the period referred to, only observing that, subsequent to 1794, writers on the Apocalypse have entered into lengthened historical proofs of the prediction being then fulfilled. Mr. Elliott, commenting on another part of this same vial—on the power given to the angel—observes, "It is evidently to the angel that poured out of the vial that this power belonged. But, just as in the case of the angel Abaddon, that conducted the locust-plague of the fifth trumpet, so here too we may suppose a visible and earthly agency operating, under the invisible angelic agency, to execute the judgment of the vial. And certainly such an agent was Napoleon. It was given him to scorch the men with fire. It is suggested by Dr. Keith that there may be an allusion in this expression to the artillery used by the French emperor, to an extent beyond all former example in military annals, as the great arm of his victories. Nor is he unwarranted in this supposition by the analogy of prophecy. If the fire noted under the sixth trumpet, as that by which the Greek empire was to fall, was literally the fire of artillery, why not the same here? But the fulfilment of the expression, taken in its common figurative sense of fiery affliction and suffering, is equally clear in the history of the wars and conquests of Napoleon. It was given him to scorch men with fire; and they were 'scorched with great heat.' As a specimen, the following extract, borrowed by Mr. Cunningham (p. 281) from official reports, in 1813, may suffice: 'The destruction and distress which marked the countries through which the French army fled from the bloody fields of Leipzig were altogether indescribable. Dead bodies covered the roads. Half-consumed French soldiers were found in the villages destroyed by the flames. Whole districts were depopulated by disease. For a month after the retreat no human being, no domestic animal, no poultry, nay, not even a sparrow was to be met with: only ravens in abundance feeding on corpses.' It is added of the men thus scorched with great heat, that "they blasphemed the name of God, who had power over these plagues, and repented not to give him glory." From the first outbreak of the revolutionary venom in France to the final prostration of the German empire in opposing it, no evidence appeared of these judgments having been effective for their intended purpose, no case of the suffering nations renouncing the papal apostacy for a purer faith, and turning, like some at the Reformation, to the God that smote them. There had been no repenting in France to give God glory. The same was substantially the case in Italy, Germany, Spain, Portugal: the Romish superstition being professed nationally, the French infidelity cherished in the heart; and, together with it, instead of humiliation under God's judgments, a bitter, blaspheming rebelliousness of spirit against him who sent them.—Rev. E. B. Elliott, 1847. The fifth vial is to be poured on the throne or seat of the beast, that is, upon Rome itself; where the Holy Spirit no longer conceals the matter under the veil of figures and allegories, perhaps on account of the great light that should then be reflected upon the prophecies—so that it shall no longer be counted what part of the vial is already accomplished, and what remains to be accomplished. By this disaster of the Roman city, the papal name shall not indeed be altogether destroyed, but spoiled of its glory and splendour, so that they shall gnaw their tongues for pain. In the mean time, however, persevering in their impenitency and obduracy, they shall abuse their pains to further degrees of blasphemy.—Mede, 1632. We repeat that virtually the temporal power of the pope is abolished. He can neither appoint his ministers nor dismiss them, or direct their measures. His presidency is merely nominal; and even that shadow of authority he will probably not be suffered to retain. The Roman hierarchy is destroyed—destroyed by suicide—but Rome will soon discover its error. The rich leavings by which the court and capital were supported owned at best but a reluctant submission to the pope himself. How will they now endure to maintain the licentious indolence of the usurping metropolis? Rome, deprived of its ecclesiastical court, unsafe as the resort of wealthy travellers, without commerce or manufactures, and surrounded by its unwholesome desert, where existence is perpetual warfare against nature, must fast sink into the decay and ruin from which it was only rescued as the capital of the Roman Catholic world. We cannot pretend to lament the danger or downfall of the church of Rome.—Quarterly Review, June, 1848.]

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared. 13 And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. 14 For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty. 15 Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame. 16 And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.

6th. The sixth angel poured out his vial; and observe, First. Where it fell; "Upon the great river Euphrates." Some take it literally, from the place where the Turkish power and empire begun; and they think this is a prophecy of the destruction of the Turkish monarchy and idolatry, which they think will be effected about the same time with that of the papacy, as another antichrist, and that thereby a way shall be made for the convenience of the Jews, those princes of the east. Others take it for the river Tiber; for as Rome is mystical Babylon, Tiber is mystical Euphrates. And when Rome is destroyed, her river and merchandise must suffer with her. [Since 1820, how have the waters of the symbolic Euphrates been dried up! They have receded from Greece on the west, Algiers and Egypt on the south, Wallachia and Moldavia on the north. And if we look to the central empire, in what a state of decrepitude do we find it!—a feeble government, an exhausted treasury, the provinces groaning under rapacious pachas, and the population yearly diminishing under the influence of tyranny, famine, and plague; so that, in the memorable phrase of Lamartine, "Turkey is dying out for want of Turks." The sixth angel has poured out his vial, and the waters of the great river Euphrates are rapidly drying up.—S. V.] Secondly. What did this vial produce? 1st. The drying up of the river, which furnished the city with wealth, provisions, and all sorts of accommodations. 2nd. A way is hereby prepared for "the kings of the East." The idolatry of the church of Rome had been a great hindrance both to the conversion of the Jews, who have been long cured of their inclination to idols, and of the Gentiles, who are hardened in their idolatry, by seeing that which so much symbolizes with it among those called Christians. And therefore it is very probable the downfall of popery, removing these obstructions, will open a way for both the Jews and other eastern nations to come into the true church of Christ. And if we suppose that Mahometanism shall fall at the same time, there will be still a more open communication between the western and eastern nations, that may facilitate the conversion of the Jews, and of "the fulness of the Gentiles." And when this work of God appears, and is about to be accomplished, no wonder if it occasion another consequence, which is, 3rd. The last effort of the great dragon; he is resolved to have another push for it, that, if possible, he may retrieve the ruinous posture of his affairs in the world. He is now rallying his forces, re-collecting all his spirits, to make one desperate rally before all be lost. This is occasioned by the pouring out of the sixth vial. And here observe, (1.) The instruments he makes use of to engage the powers of the earth in his cause and quarrel; "Three unclean spirits, like frogs," come forth, one "out of the mouth of the dragon," another "out of the mouth of the beast," and a third "out of the mouth of the false prophet." Hell, the secular power of antichrist, and the ecclesiastical power, all combine to send their several instruments furnished with hellish malice, with worldly policy, and with religious falsehood and deceit; and these should muster up the devil's forces for a decisive battle. (2.) The means these instruments should use to engage the powers of the earth in this war. They should work pretended miracles,—the old stratagem of him "whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness," 2 Thess. ii. 9, 10. Some think, a little before the fall of antichrist, the popish pretence of power to work miracles will be revived, and will very much amuse and deceive the world. (3.) The field of battle, a place called Armageddon; that is, say some, the mount of Megiddo, near to which, by a stream issuing from thence, Barak overcame Sisera, and all the kings in alliance with him, Jud. v. 19. And in the valley of Megiddo Josiah was slain. This place had been famous for two events of a very different nature, the first very happy for the church of God, the latter very unhappy; but it should now be the field of the last battle in which the church shall be engaged, and she shall be victorious. This battle required time to prepare for it, and therefore the farther account of it is suspended till we come to the nineteenth chapter, ver. 19, 20. (4.) The warning which God gives of this great and decisive trial, to engage his kindled the sweet incense of prayer, bringing down blessing upon earth, by man's sin kindles the fiery descending curse; just as the river Nile, which ordinarily is the source of Egypt's fertility, became blood and a curse through Egypt's sin" (Fausset).

xvi. 12. "Dried up;" the literal Babylon was taken when the channel of the Euphrates was laid dry by Cyrus. "Kings of the east;" the kings which come from the rising of the sun. Our Lord is called "the dayspring from on high" (Luke i. 78). Compare Zech.

iii. 8, vi. 12. The saints are meant, as the co-heirs of the Redeemer's kingdom, kings and priests unto Christ, the Sun of Righteousness (Wordsworth). "Some understand by 'the kings of the east' the Jewish nation, and by their 'way' their return to Palestine. This interpretation is grounded on Zech. x. 10, 11, which, however, was fulfilled in the return from the Babylonish and Egyptian captivity" (Webster and Wilkinson).

xvi. 14. "Devils;" rather, "demons." Concerning this passage, people to prepare for it, ver. 15. It would be sudden and unexpected, and therefore Christians should be clothed, and armed, and ready for it, that they might not be surprised and ashamed. When God's cause comes to be tried, and his battles to be fought, all his people should be ready to stand up for his interest, and be faithful and valiant in his service.

[We determine the character of these three frogs, or spirits, by tracing their origin. The first issues from the mouth of the dragon, which is the old serpent the devil. This can be nothing else than infidelity, the religion of Rome in its dragon form, in conjunction with its usual concomitants, democracy, and rebellion against all authority, Divine and human. The next issues from the mouth of the beast; that is, the seven-headed and ten-horned beast. The characteristic principle of this beast, as distinguished from that of the false prophet, is despotism. The third and last spirit comes from the mouth of the false prophet, and, beyond question, is popery. These symbolic frogs covered Europe, penetrating everywhere, loading the air with their croakings, and polluting the earth with their filth. But, though individually insignificant and base, collectively they have been the authors of a tremendous catastrophe. In the execution of their commission, they have gathered the kings of the earth and of the whole world to "the battle of that great day of God Almighty." This is the next terrible scene that opens before us. On the very eve of battle a solemn warning is tendered: "Behold, I come as a thief;" for this event is to overtake the world with unprecedented and startling suddenness. "Blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame." This warning plainly imports that, immediately before that great day, individuals and churches should be exposed to peculiar temptation to forsake their principles, here symbolized by their garments. The temptation will not arise from the persecution of force, but from the seduction of these three spirits. Do recent events throw no light on this prediction? Has not Puseyism solicited some to part with the doctrine of Christ's atonement and intercession? Has not Erastianism solicited others to give up the headship of the Lord Jesus? And has not neology tempted others to make shipwreck of the faith altogether? A peculiar blessedness will be his who "watcheth and keepeth his garments."—S. V. The coincidence between this prophecy and the following, as unfulfilled prophecies in the Old Testament, is worthy of special notice by all who would patiently investigate the true meaning, and not run away with hasty, and crude, and partial, though plausible, interpretations, grounded on incidental resemblances, Ps. clix. 7-9; Isa. xxxiv. 1-6; Eze. xxxviii. 1-xxix. 21; Dan. ii. 44, 45; vii. 9-12; xi. 40-45; Mic. v. 10-15; vii. 4-17; Zec. xiv. 12-19.—T. Scott.]

17 And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. 18 And there were voices, and thunders, and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great. 19 And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. 20 And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found. 21 And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

Here we have an account of the seventh and last angel pouring forth his vial, contributing his part towards the accomplishment of the downfall of Babylon, which was the finishing stroke. And here, as before, observe,

First. Where this plague fell; on the air, that is, upon the prince of the power of the air, that is, the devil. His powers were restrained, his policies confounded, he was bound in God's chain, the sword of God was upon his eye and upon his arm; for he, as well as the powers of the earth, is subject to the almighty power of God. He had used all possible means to preserve the antichristian interest, and to prevent the fall of Babylon; all the influence that he has upon the minds of men, binding their judgments, and perverting them; hardening their hearts, raising their enmity to the Gospel as high as could be. But now here is a vial poured out upon his kingdom, and he is not able to support his tottering cause and interest any longer.

Secondly. What it produced: 1. A thankful voice from heaven, pronouncing that now the work was done. The church triumphant in heaven saw it, and rejoiced; the church militant on earth saw it, and became triumphant: "It is finished." 2. A mighty commotion on the earth, an earthquake, so great as never was before, shaking the very centre; and this ushered in by the usual concomitants of thunder and lightnings. 3. The fall of Babylon, which was divided into three parts, called "the cities of the nations," ver. 19, having had rule over the nations, and taken in the idolatry of the nations, incorporating into her religion something of the Jewish, something of the pagan, and something of the Christian religion; and so was three cities in one. God now remembered this great and wicked city, though for some time he seemed to have forgotten her idolatry and cruelty, yet now he gives "unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." And this downfall extended farther than to the seat of antichrist; it reached from the centre to the circumference; and every island, and every mountain, that seemed by nature and situation the most secured, were carried away in the deluge of this ruin.

Thirdly. How the antichristian party were affected with it. Though it fell upon them as a dreadful storm, as if the stones of the city, tossed up into the air, came down upon their heads, like hailstones of a talent weight each, yet they were so far from repenting, that they blasphemed that God who thus punished them. Here was a dreadful plague of the heart, a spiritual judgment more dreadful and destructive than all the rest. Observe, 1. The greatest calamities that can befall men will not bring them to repentance without the grace of God working with them. 2. Those who are not made better by the judgments of God are always the worse for them. 3. To be hardened in sin and enmity against God, by his righteous judgments, is a certain token of utter destruction.

CHAPTER XVII.

This chapter is another representative of those things that had been revealed before concerning the wickedness and ruin of antichrist. This antichrist had been before represented as a beast, and is now described as a great whore. And here, 1. The apostle is invited to see this vile woman, ver. 1, 2. II. He tells us what an appearance she made, ver. 3-6. III. The mystery of it is explained to him, ver. 7-12. And, IV. Her ruin foretold, ver. 13 to the end.

AND there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither; I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters: 2 With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication. 3 So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. 4 And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication: 5 And upon her forehead was a name, written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH. 6 And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration.

ROMISH COMMEMORATIVE MEDAL OF THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW, PARIS.

Here we have a new vision, not as to the matter of it, for that is contemporary with what came under the three last vials, but as to the manner of description, &c. Observe,

First. The invitation given to the apostle to take a view of what was here to be represented; ver. 1. "Come hither, and I will shew thee the judgment of the great whore." &c. This is a name of great infamy. A whore is one that is married, and has been false to her husband's bed; has forsaken the guide of her youth, and broken the covenant of God. She had been a prostitute to the kings of the earth, whom she had intoxicated "with the wine of her fornication."

Secondly. The appearance she made, and it was gay and gaudy, like such sort of creatures; ver. 4. "She was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls." Here were all the allure-

Wordsworth thinks that it betokens "an alliance of infidel, democratical, and papal powers. There will be a league of corrupt religion with lawlessness, blasphemy, infidelity." "To gather them:" this is exactly the action and effect of the diffusion and prevalence of opinion. Webster and Wilkinson quote Canning's saying: "The next great war will be a war of opinion."

xvii. 1. "Whore," or "harlot:" the term is frequently applied to the Jewish Church—e.g., Isa. i. 21; Jer. ii. 20. The church and nation of Israel were regarded as betrothed to God. (Compare Psa. xlv. 1; Hos. ii.) Faithlessness to him and his worship was described, therefore, as harlotry. Following the same analogy, the Christian Church is the bride, the Lamb's wife (chap. xxi. 2, 9), the woman who, amid all trials and persecutions, remains faithful to her absent lord. (Compare chap. xii. 6.) Hence, to preserve the harmony of the interpretation, it seems natural to understand the harlot as representing some faithless or apostate church.

Thirdly. Her principal seat and residence; "Upon the beast that had seven heads and ten horns," &c.; that is to say, Rome, the city on seven hills, infamous for idolatry, tyranny, and blasphemy.

Fourthly. Her name, which "was written on her forehead." It was the custom of impudent harlots to hang out signs, with their names, that all might know what they were. Now in this observe, 1. She is named from her place of residence, Babylon the Great. But, that we might not take it for the old Babylon, literally so called, we are told there is a mystery in the name, it is some other great city resembling the old Babylon. 2. She is named from her infamous way and practice. Not only a harlot, but a mother of harlots; breeding up harlots, and nursing and training them up to idolatry, and all sort of lewdness and wickedness; the parent and nurse of all false religion and filthy conversation.

Fifthly. Her diet; she satiated herself with "the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus." She drank their blood with that greediness that she intoxicated herself with it. It was so pleasant to her that she could not tell when she had enough of it. She was satiated, but never satisfied.

7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns. 8 The beast that thou sawest was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the foundation of the world, when they behold the beast that was, and is not, and yet is. 9 And here is the mind which hath wisdom. The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth. 10 And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space. 11 And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition. 12 And the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast. 13 These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast.

Here we have the mystery of this vision explained. The apostle wondered at the sight of this woman; the angel undertakes to open this vision to him, it being the key of the former visions. And he tells the apostle what was meant by the beast on which the woman sat; but it is so explained as still to need farther explanation. 1. This beast "was, and is not, and yet is;" that is, it was a seat of idolatry and persecution; and is not, that is, not in the ancient form, which was pagan; and yet it is, it is truly the seat of idolatry and tyranny, though of another sort and form. It "ascends out of the bottomless pit." Idolatry and cruelty are the issue and product of hell, and it shall return thither and go into perdition. 2. This beast had seven heads; which have a double signification: 1st. "Seven mountains;" the seven hills on which Rome stands. And, 2. "Seven kings," or sorts of government. Rome was governed by kings, consuls, tribunes, decemviri, dictators, emperors that were pagan, and emperors that were Christian; five of these were extinct when this prophecy was written; one was then in being, that is, the pagan emperor; and the other, that is, the Christian emperor, was yet to come, ver. 10. This beast, the papacy, makes an eighth governor, and sets up idolatry again. 3rd. This beast had "ten horns," which are said to be "ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet;" "as yet," that is, as some, shall not rise up till the Roman empire be broken in pieces; or, as others, shall not rise up till near the end of antichrist's reign; and so shall reign but as it were one hour with her, but shall for that time be very unanimous and very zealous in that interest, and entirely devoted to it, divesting themselves of their prerogatives and revenues, things so dear to princes, out of an unaccountable fondness for the papacy. (See Supplementary Notes on ch. xiii., and at end of book.)

14 These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful. 15 And he saith unto me, The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. 16 And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. 17 For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled. 18 And the woman which thou sawest is that great city, which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

First. Here is a war begun between the beast and his followers and the Lamb and his followers; the beast and his army, to an eye of sense, appear much stronger than the Lamb and his army. One would think an army with a lamb at the head of them could not stand before "the great red dragon." But,

Secondly. Here is a victory gained by the Lamb; "The Lamb shall overcome." Christ must reign till all enemies be put under his feet. He will be sure to meet with many enemies, and much opposition, but he will also be sure to gain the victory.

Thirdly. Here is the ground and reason of the victory assigned; and that is taken, 1. From the character of the Lamb; "He is King of kings, and Lord of lords." He has, both by nature and by office, supreme dominion and power over all things; all the powers of earth and hell are subject to his check and control. 2. From the character of his followers; "They are called, and chosen, and faithful;" they are called out by commission to this warfare, they are chosen and fitted for it, and they will be faithful in it. Such an army, under such a commander, will at length carry all the world before them.

Fourthly. The victory is justly acknowledged, 1. By the vast multitudes that paid obedience and subjection to the beast and to the whore. She sat upon (that is, presided over) many waters; and these waters were so many multitudes of people, and nations, of all languages; yea, she reigned not only over kingdoms, but over the kings, and they were her tributaries and vassals, ver. 15, 18. 2. By the powerful influence which God hereby shewed he had over the minds of great men; their hearts were in his hand, and he turned them as he pleased; for, 1st. It was of God, and to fulfil his will, that these kings "agreed to give their kingdom unto the beast;" they were judicially blinded and hardened to do so. And, 2nd. It was of God that afterwards their hearts were turned against the whore, to hate her, and to make "her desolate and naked, and to eat her flesh, and burn her with fire;" they shall at length see their folly, and how they have been bewitched and enslaved by the papacy, and, out of a just resentment, shall not only fall off from Rome, but shall be made the instruments of God's providence in her destruction. (See concluding note on Revelation.)

CHAPTER XVIII.

We have here, I. An angel proclaiming the fall of Babylon, ver. 1, 2. II. Assigning the reasons of her fall, ver. 3. III. Giving warning to all that belonged to God to come out of her, ver. 4, 5; and to assist in her destruction, ver. 6-8. IV. The great lamentation made for her by those that had been large sharers in her sinful pleasures and profits, ver. 9-20. V. The great joy that there would be among others at the sight of her irrecoverable ruin, ver. 20 to the end.

AND after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory. 2 And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. 3 For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies.

The downfall and destruction of Babylon is an event so fully determined in the counsels of God, and of such consequence to his interests and glory, that the visions and predictions concerning it are repeated.

First. Here is another angel sent from heaven, attended with great power and lustre, ver. 1. He had not only light in himself to discern the truth of his own prediction, but to inform and enlighten the world about that great event; and not only light to discern it, but power to accomplish it.

Secondly. This angel publishes the fall of Babylon as a thing already come to pass; and this he does with a mighty strong voice, that all might hear the cry, and might see how well this angel was pleased to be the messenger of such tidings. Here seems to be an allusion to the prediction of the fall of pagan Babylon, Isa. xxi. 9, where the word is repeated as it is here, "is fallen, is fallen." Some have thought a double fall is hereby intended; first her apostasy, and then her ruin; and they think the words immediately following favour their opinion—"She is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and the cage of every unclean and hateful bird," ver. 2. But this is also borrowed from Isa. xxi. 9, and seems to describe, not so much her sin of entertaining idols, which are truly called devils, as her punishment, it being a common notion that unclean spirits, as well as your ominous and hateful birds, used to haunt a city or house that lay in its ruins.

Thirdly. The reason of this ruin is declared; for though God is not obliged to give any account of his matters, yet he is pleased to do so, especially in those dispensations of providence that are most awful and tremendous. The wickedness of Babylon had been very great, for she had not only forsaken the true God herself, and set up idols, but had, with great art and industry, drawn all xvii. 3. "Scarlet:" "The dye made from the Coccus ilicis, or kermes, a small insect found on the shoots of a species of oak in Spain and Western Africa. The use of this in dyeing crimson or deep scarlet has been superseded in modern times by the cochineal insect (Coccus cacti)."—Webster and Wilkinson.

xvii. 15. "The waters . . . are peoples, and multitudes," &c. The sea is a common emblem of nations and peoples. "Thou stillest the raging of the sea, and the madness of the people." The second clause throws an interpreting light on the first. Whatever power or influence the harlot exerted over the people, she could not have had unless people had consented to her taking it; but the pretensions she puts forward are just those which there is a proneness in human nature to admit. "A large majority, as is well known, of professing Christians in the world are members of churches which distinctly claim infallibility, a claim which could never have been established if men had not been predisposed to admit it" (Whately).

4 And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. 5 For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. 6 Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled fill to her double. 7 How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. 8 Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.

Here is fair warning given to all that expect mercy from God, that they should not only "come out of her," but be assisting in her destruction, ver. 4, 5. Where observe, 1. That God may have a people even in Babylon, some that belong to the election of grace. 2. That God's people shall be called out of Babylon, and called effectually. 3. Those that are resolved to partake with wicked men in their sins must receive of their plagues. 4. That when the sins of a people reach up to heaven, the wrath of God will reach down to the earth. 5. That though private revenge is forbidden, yet God will have his people act under him, when called to it, in pulling down his and their inveterate and implacable enemies, ver. 6. 6. That God will proportion the punishment of sinners to the measure of their wickedness, pride, and security, ver. 7. 7. That when destruction comes on a people suddenly, the surprise is a great aggravation of their misery, ver. 8.

9 And the kings of the earth, who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning, 10 Standing afar off for the fear of her torment, saying, Alas, alas that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come. 11 And the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her; for no man buyeth their merchandise any more: 12 The merchandise of gold, and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and all thyine wood, and all manner vessels of ivory, and all manner vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, 13 And cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flour, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. 14 And the fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all. 15 The merchants of these things, which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, 16 And saying, Alas, alas that great city, that was clothed in fine linen, and purple, and scarlet, and decked with gold, and precious stones, and pearls! 17 For in one hour so great riches is come to nought. And every shipmaster, and all the company in ships, and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off, 18 And cried when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city! 19 And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate.

First. Who are the mourners; those that had been bewitched by her fornication, and those that had been sharers in her sensual pleasures, and those that had been gainers by her wealth and trade, "the kings and the merchants of the earth." The "kings of the earth," whom she had flattered into idolatry, by allowing them to be arbitrary and tyrannical over their subjects, while they were obsequious to her; and the merchants, that is, those that trafficked with her for indulgences, pardons, dispensations, preferments, &c.: these will mourn, because by this craft they got their wealth.

Secondly. What was the manner of their mourning. 1. They stood afar off, they durst not come nigh her. Even Babylon's friends will stand at a distance from her fall. Though they had been partakers with her in her sins, and in her sinful pleasures and profits, they were not willing to bear a share in her plagues. 2. They made a grievous outcry, "Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city!" 3. They wept, and "cast dust upon their heads," ver. 19. "The pleasures of sin are but for a season," and they will end in dismal sorrow; and all those that rejoice in the success of the church's enemies will share with them in their downfall; and those that have most indulged themselves in pride and pleasure are the worst able to bear calamities: their sorrows will be as excessive as their pleasure and jollity was before.

Thirdly. What was the cause of their mourning; not their sin, but their punishment. They did not lament their fall into idolatry, and luxury, and persecution, but their fall into ruin,—the loss of their traffic, and of their wealth and power. The spirit of antichrist is a worldly spirit, and their sorrow is a mere worldly sorrow. They do not lament for the anger of God that was now fallen upon them, but for the loss of their outward comforts. We have a large schedule and inventory of the wealth and merchandise of this city, all which was suddenly lost, ver. 12, 13, and lost irrecoverably, ver. 14. "All things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all." The church of God may fall for a time, but she shall rise again; but the fall of Babylon will be an utter overthrow, like that of Sodom and Gomorrah. Godly sorrow is some support under affliction, but mere worldly sorrow adds to the calamity.

20 Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her. 21 And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. 22 And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee;

xviii. 2. "Mightily" is omitted by all the ancient MSS. Read, therefore, "He cried with a strong voice." "Foul spirit;" the word here rendered "foul" is the same as that rendered in this verse "unclean." It is better, therefore, to translate both by the same English word. Alford uses the word "unclean" in both cases.

xviii. 6. This verse seems to be addressed to the executioners of God's wrath, and not to God's people, who are warned to come out of Babylon before her fall. It is better to adopt the rendering "repay," instead of "reward her," &c. The word "you" is not found in any of the ancient MSS.; hence the verse may read, "Repay to her as she repaid, and double, double according to her works."

xviii. 12. "Thyine wood;" Alford renders "citron wood." It is the Latin Citrus, and is said to be a species of cedar, or lignum vitae.

23 And the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived. 24 And in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth.

We have here an account of the joy and triumph there was both in heaven and earth at the irrecoverable fall of Babylon; while her own people were bewailing her, the servants of God are called to "rejoice over her," ver. 20. Where observe, 1. How universal this joy would be; heaven and earth, angels and saints, would join in it. That which is matter of rejoicing to the servants of God in this world is matter of rejoicing to the angels in heaven. 2. How just and reasonable; and that, 1st. Because the fall of Babylon was an act of God's vindictive justice. God was then avenging his people's cause; they had committed their cause to Him "to whom vengeance belongs," and now the year of recompence was come for the controversies of Zion; and, though they did not take pleasure in the miseries of any, yet they had reason to rejoice in the discoveries of the glorious justice of God. 2nd. Because it was an irrecoverable ruin. This enemy should never molest them any more; and of this they were assured by a remarkable token, ver. 21. An angel from heaven takes up a stone like a great millstone, and casts it into the sea, saying, Thus shall Babylon be thrown down with violence, and be found no more at all. The place should be no longer habitable by man, no work should be done there, no comfort enjoyed, no light seen there; but utter darkness and desolation, as the reward of her great wickedness; first, in deceiving the nations with her sorceries; and secondly, in destroying and murdering those that she could not deceive, ver. 24. Such abominable sins deserved so great a ruin.

CHAPTER XIX.

In this chapter we have, I. A further account of the triumphant song of angels and saints for the fall of Babylon, ver. 1-4. II. The marriage between Christ and the church proclaimed and perfected, ver. 5-10. III. Another warlike expedition of the glorious Head and Husband of the church, with the success of it, ver. 10 to the end.

AND after these things I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia; Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power, unto the Lord our God: 2 For true and righteous are his judgments: for he hath judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. 3 And again they said, Alleluia. And her smoke rose up for ever and ever. 4 And the four and twenty elders and the four beasts fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying, Amen; Alleluia.

The fall of Babylon being fixed, finished, and declared to be irrecoverable, in the foregoing chapter, this begins with a holy triumph over her, in pursuance to the order given forth, "Rejoice over her thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets," ch. xviii. 20. They now gladly answer the call; and here you have, 1. The form of their thanksgiving, in that heavenly and most comprehensive word, "Alleluia, praise ye the Lord;" with this they begin, with this they go on, and with this they end, ver. 4. Their prayers are now turned into praises, their hosannas end in halleluias. 2. The matter of their thanksgiving; they praise him for the truth of his word, and the righteousness of his providential conduct, especially in this great event, the ruin of Babylon; which had been a mother, nurse, and nest of idolatry, lewdness, and cruelty, ver. 2; for which signal example of Divine justice they ascribe "salvation, and glory, and honour, and power" unto God. 3. The effect of these their praises. When the angels and saints cried, "Alleluia," her fire burned more fiercely, and "her smoke ascended for ever and ever," ver. 3. The surest way to have our deliverances continued and completed is to give God the glory of what he has done for us. Praising God for what we have is praying in the most effectual manner for what is yet farther to be done for us; the praises of the saints blow up the fire of God's wrath against the common enemy. 4. The blessed harmony between the angels and the saints in this triumphant song, ver. 4. The churches and their ministers take the melodious sound from the angels, and repeat it; falling down and worshipping God, they cry, "Amen, Alleluia."

5 And a voice came out of the throne, saying, Praise our God, all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great. 6 And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. 7 Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. 8 And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints. 9 And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb. And he saith unto me, These are the true sayings of God. 10 And I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellowservant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus: worship God: for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.

The triumphant song being ended, an epithalamium, or marriage-song, begins ver. 6. Where observe,

First. The concert of heavenly music. The chorus was large and loud, "as the voice of many waters," and "of mighty thunderings." God is fearful in praises; there is no discord in heaven, the morning stars sing together; no jarring string, or key untuned, but pure and perfect melody.

Secondly. The occasion of this song; and that is, the reign and dominion of that omnipotent God who has redeemed his church by his own blood, and is now in a more public manner betrothing her to himself; ver. 7. "The marriage of the Lamb is come." Some think this refers to the conversion of the Jews, which they suppose will succeed the fall of Babylon; others, to the general resurrection. The former seems more probable. Now,

1. You have here a description of the bride, how she appeared; not in the gay and gaudy dress of the mother of harlots, but "in fine linen, clean and white," which "is the righteousness of the saints;" in the robes of Christ's righteousness, both imputed for justification and imparted for sanctification; the stola, the white robe of absolution, adoption, and enfranchisement; and the white robe of purity and universal holiness. She had washed her robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; and these her nuptial ornaments she did not purchase by any price of her own, but received them as the gift and grant of her blessed Lord.

2. The marriage feast, which, though not particularly described, as Mat. xxii. 4, yet is declared to be such as would make them all happy that were called to it, so called as to accept the invitation: a feast made up of the promises of the Gospel, "the true sayings of God," ver. 9. These promises, opened, applied, sealed, and earnest by the Spirit of God in holy eucharistical ordinances, are the marriage feast; and the whole collective body of all those that partake of this feast is the bride, the Lamb's wife: they eat into one body, and drink into one Spirit; and are not mere spectators or guests, but coalesce into the espoused party, the mystical body of Christ.

3. The transport of joy which the apostle felt in himself at this vision. He fell down at the feet of the angel to worship him, supposing him to be more than a creature; or having his thoughts at the present overpowered by the vehemency of his affections. Where observe, 1. What honour he offered to the angel; he "fell at his feet to worship him." This prostration was a part of external worship; it was a posture of proper adoration. 2. How the angel refused it; and this was with some resentment. "See thou do it not;" have a care what thou doest; thou art doing a wrong thing. 3. He gave a very good reason for his refusal: "I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus;" I am a creature; thine equal in office, though not in nature; I, as an angel and messenger of God, have the testimony of Jesus, a charge to be a witness for him, and to testify concerning him; and thou, as an apostle, having the "Spirit of prophecy," hast the same testimony to give in; and therefore we are in this brethren and fellow-servants. 4. He directs him to the true and only object of religious worship, and that is, God; worship God, and him alone. This fully condemns the practice, both of the papists, in worshipping the elements of bread and wine, and saints, and angels; and the practice of the Socinians and Arians, who do not believe that Christ is truly and by nature God, and yet pay him religious worship. And this shews what wretched fig-leaves all their evasions and excuses are which they offer in their own vindication. They stand hereby convicted of idolatry by a messenger from heaven.

11 And I saw heaven opened, and behold a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. 12 His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written, that no man knew, but he himself. 13 And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood: and his name is called The Word of God. 14 And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean. 15 And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the

Some identify it with the Cypressus thyioides, or Thuia articulata. The thuia was an evergreen African wood, from which choice vessels and statues were made.

xviii. 20. "Rejoice over her," &c.: most of the ancient MSS. read, "Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets."

xix. 1. Alford renders, "After these things I heard as it were a loud voice of a great multitude in heaven, saying, Hallelujah; the salvation and the glory belong unto our God." The words "and honour" are omitted in the best MSS.

xix. 5. "A voice came out:" the Sinaitic MS. here has the plural—"voices came out," &c.

xix. 12. "Many crowns;" more properly "diadems." These are not merely the wreaths of victory, but the diadems of royalty, worn by him who is "King of kings."

xix. 17. "Supper of the great God:" Alford renders "banquet;"

winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God. 16 And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS. 17 And I saw an angel standing in the sun; and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; 18 That ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great. 19 And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army. 20 And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. 21 And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth: and all the fowls were filled with their flesh.

No sooner was the marriage solemnized between Christ and his church, by the conversion of the Jews, but the glorious Head and Husband of the church is called out to a new expedition; which seems to be the great battle that was to be fought at Armageddon, foretold ch. xvi. 16. And here observe,

First. The description of the great Commander: 1. By the seat of his empire; and that is, heaven; his throne is there, and his power and authority is heavenly and Divine. 2. His equipage. He is again described as sitting on a white horse, to shew the equity of the cause, and certainty of success. 3. His attributes. He is faithful and true to his covenant and promise; he is righteous in all his judicial and military proceedings; he has a penetrating insight into all the strength and stratagems of his enemies; he has a large and extensive dominion, many crowns, for he is "King of kings, and Lord of lords," 4. His armour; and that is, "a vesture dipped in blood," either his only blood by which he purchased this mediatorial power, or the blood of his enemies, over whom he has always prevailed. 5. His name: "The Word of God." A name that none fully know; but himself; only this we know, that this "Word was God manifest in the flesh;" but his perfections are incomprehensible by any creature.

Secondly. The army which he commands, ver. 14. A very large one, made up of many armies; angels and saints following his conduct, and resembling him in their equipage, and in their armour of purity and righteousness; "chosen, and called, and faithful."

Thirdly. The weapons of his warfare. "A sharp sword," proceeding from his mouth, ver. 15, with which he smites the nations; either the threatenings of the written word, which now he is going to execute, or rather, his word of command, calling on his followers to take a just revenge on his and their enemies, who are now put into the wine-press of the wrath of God, to be trodden under foot by him.

Fourthly. The ensigns of his authority, his coat of arms; a name written on his vesture and thigh, "King of kings, and Lord of lords;" asserting his authority and power, and the cause of the quarrel, ver. 16.

Fifthly. An invitation given to the fowls of heaven, that they should come and see the battle, and share in the spoil and pillage of the field, ver. 17, 18; intimating that this great decisive engagement should leave the enemies of the church a feast for the birds of prey, and that all the world should have cause to rejoice in the issue of it.

Sixthly. The battle joined, the enemy falls on with great fury, headed by the beast and the kings of the earth; the powers of earth and hell gathered to make their utmost effort, ver. 19.

Sevently. The victory gained by the great and glorious Head of the church; the beast and the false prophet, the leaders of the army, were taken prisoners; both he that led them by power, and he that led them by policy and falsehood; these are taken and cast into the burning lake, made incapable of molesting the church of God any more; and their followers, whether officers or common soldiers, are given up to military execution, and made a feast for the fowls of heaven. Though the Divine vengeance will chiefly fall upon the beast and the false prophet, yet it will be no excuse to those that fight under their banner, that they only followed their leaders, and obeyed their command: since they would fight for them, they must fall and perish with them. "Be wise now, therefore, O ye kings; be instructed, ye rulers of the earth; kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way," Ps. ii. 10, 11.

CHAPTER XX.

This chapter is thought by some to be the darkest part of all this prophecy; it is very probable the things contained in it are not yet accomplished, and therefore it is the wiser way to content ourselves with general observations, than to be positive and particular in our explanations of it. Here we have an account, 1. Of the binding of Satan for a thousand years, ver. 1—3. 2. The reign of the saints with Christ for the same time, ver. 4—6. 3. Of the loosing of Satan, and the conflict of the church with Gog and Magog, ver. 7—10. 4. Of the day of judgment, ver. 11 to the end.

and, following the best authorities, joins the word "great" to "banquet," and not to the word "God," as in the English version.

xix. 20. There is some authority for reading, "The beast was taken, and those that were with him, the false prophet that wrought the miracles in his presence," &c.

xx. 1. "The bottomless pit;" rather, "the abyss."

xx. 2. "A thousand years;" many expositors, ancient and modern, have taken this period to refer to an early one in the history

AND I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit and a great chain in his hand. 2 And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil, and Satan, and bound him a thousand years, 3 And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, till the thousand years should be fulfilled: and after that he must be loosed a little season.

We have here a prophecy of the binding of Satan for a certain term of time, in which he should have much less power, and the church much more peace, than before. The power of Satan was broke in part by the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world; it was further reduced by the empire's becoming Christian; it was yet farther broken by the downfall of the mystical Babylon; but still this serpent had many heads, and when one is wounded, another has life remaining in it. Here we have a farther limitation and diminution of his power. Where observe, 1. To whom this work of binding Satan is committed: to an angel from heaven. It is very probable this angel is no other than the Lord Jesus Christ; the description of him will hardly agree with any other. He is one that has power "to bind the strong man armed, and to cast him out and spoil his goods;" and therefore must be stronger than he. 2. The means he makes use of in this work. He hath a chain and a key; a great chain to bind Satan, and the key of the prison in which he was to be confined. Christ never wants proper powers and instruments to break the power of Satan, for he has the powers of heaven and the keys of hell. 3. The execution of this work, ver. 2, 3. 1st. "He laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan." Neither the strength of the dragon nor the subtlety of the serpent were sufficient to rescue him out of the hands of Christ; he caught hold, and kept his hold. And, 2nd. He "cast him into the bottomless pit;" cast him down with force, and with a just vengeance, to his own place and prison, from which he had been permitted to break out, and disturb the churches, and deceive the nations. Now he is brought back to that prison, and there laid in chains. 3rd. He is shut up, and a seal set upon him. Christ shuts, and none can open; he shuts by his power, seals by his authority; and his lock and seal even the devils themselves cannot break open. 4th. We have the term of this confinement of Satan: a thousand years; after which he was to be loosed again for a little season. The church should have a considerable time of peace and prosperity, but all her trials were not yet over.

4 And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them: and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. 5 But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. 6 Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection: on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years.

We have here an account of the reign of the saints for the same space of time in which Satan continued bound. And here observe, 1. Who they were that received such honour. Those that had suffered for Christ, and all that had faithfully adhered to him, not receiving "the mark of the beast," nor worshipping his image; all that had kept themselves clear of pagan and papal idolatry. 2. The honour bestowed upon them. 1st. They were raised from the dead, and restored to life. This may be taken either literally or figuratively; they were, in a civil and political sense, dead, and had a political resurrection; their liberties and privileges were revived and restored. 2nd. Thrones and power of judgment were given to them; they were possessed of great honour, and interest, and authority; I suppose rather of a spiritual than of a secular nature. 3rd. They "reigned with Christ a thousand years." They that "suffer with Christ shall reign with Christ;" they shall reign with him in his spiritual and heavenly kingdom, in a glorious conformity to him in wisdom, righteousness, and holiness, beyond what had been known before in the world. This is called "the first resurrection;" which none but those that have served Christ and suffered for him shall be favoured with. As for the wicked, they shall not be raised up and restored to their power again till Satan be let loose. This may be called a resurrection, as the conversion of the Jews is said to be "life from the dead." 3. The happiness of these servants of God is declared. 1st. They are "blessed and holy," ver. 6. None can be blessed but they that are holy, and all that are holy shall be blessed. These were holy as a sort of fruits to God in this spiritual resurrection, and as such blessed by him. 2nd. They are secured from the power of the second death. We know something of the Church. This view was held by Origen, Jerome, Augustine, and the principal patristic writers down to Aquinas and Bede. The difficulty of this view is that no period in the past history of the Church and the world seems fully or fairly to correspond with such an imprisonment of Satan for a thousand years.

xx. 8. "Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle," of what the first death is, and it is awful; but we know not what this second death is; it must be much more dreaded; it is the death of the soul, eternal separation from God. The Lord grant we may never know what it is by experience. They that have had experience of a spiritual resurrection are saved from the power of the second death.

7 And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, 8 And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle: the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. 9 And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city: and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. 10 And the devil that deceived them was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

Here we have an account of the return of the church's troubles, and another mighty conflict, very sharp, but short and decisive. Observe, 1. The restraints laid for a long time on Satan are at length taken off. While this world lasts, Satan's power in it will not be wholly destroyed; it may be limited and lessened, but he will have something still to do for the disturbance of the people of God. 2. No sooner is Satan let loose but he falls to his old work, deceiving the nations, and so stirring them up to make war with the saints and servants of God, which they would never do if he had not first deceived them. They are deceived, both as to the cause they engaged in, (they believe it to be a good cause, when it is indeed a very bad one,) and they are deceived in the issue; they expect to be successful, but are sure to lose the day. 3. His last efforts seem to be the greatest. The power now permitted to him seems to be more unlimited than before; he has now liberty to beat up for his volunteers in all the four quarters of the earth; and he raised a mighty army, the number of which was "as the sand of the sea," ver. 8. 4. We have the names of the principal commanders in this army under the dragon, Gog and Magog. We need not be too inquisitive what particular powers are meant by these names, since the army was gathered from all parts of the world. These names are found in other parts of Scripture. Magog we read of in Gen. x. 2; he was one of the sons of Japhael, and peopled the country called Syria, from which his descendants spread into many other parts. Of Gog and Magog together we only read in Eze. xxxviii. 2, a prophecy from whence this in the revelation borrows many of its images. 5. We have the march and military disposition of this formidable army; ver. 9, "They went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city," that is, the spiritual Jerusalem, in which the most precious interests of the people of God are lodged, and therefore to them a beloved city. The army of the saints is described as drawn forth out of the city, and lying under the walls of it, to defend it. They were encamped about Jerusalem; but the army of the enemy was so much superior to that of the church, that they compassed them and their city about. 6. You have an account of the battle, and the issue of this war: "Fire came down from God out of heaven and devoured the enemy." Thus the ruin of Gog and Magog is foretold, Eze. xxxviii. 22, "I will rain upon him, and upon his bounds an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, and fire and brimstone." God would, in an extraordinary and more immediate manner, fight this last and decisive battle for his people, that the victory might be complete, and the glory redound to himself. 7. The doom and punishment of the grand enemy, the devil. He is now cast into hell, with his two great officers, the beast and the false prophet, tyranny and idolatry; and that, not for any term of time, but to be there "tormented day and night for ever and ever."

[We may expect that a thousand years will follow the final destruction of the antichristian, idolatrous, persecuting powers, during which pure Christianity, in doctrine, worship, and holiness, will be diffused over all the earth; and all idolatry, infidelity, cruelty, and all other evils, which now harass and desolate the earth, will be restrained by the almighty operation of the Holy Spirit; and godliness, righteousness, peace, and purity, will render the earth in some measure like heaven itself. Hitherto the depravity of human nature, and the malignant agency of apostate angels, have been shewn in the state of the world. Nothing but the power of God can prevent men from listening to the temptations of apostate angels, or from opposing, despising, or perverting the Gospel itself. But at length the Lord will arise; by his mighty power he will destroy the wicked, and confine fallen angels. By the all-powerful working of the Holy Spirit fallen man will be new-created; and repentance, faith, and holiness, will as certainly prevail as unbelief, impenitence, and unholiness now do. That measure of righteousness, which the universal prevalence of true Christianity must produce, will immensely lessen the quantity even of natural evils. We may easily perceive what a variety of dreadful pains, diseases, and other calamities, must cease, if all men were true and consistent Christians. All the evils of public and private contention will be ended, happiness of every kind largely increased. Every man will try to alleviate suffering, instead of adding to the sorrows around him; nor shall they hurt or destroy in all the holy mountain of God. The wild notions and extravagant practices grafted on the belief of a millennium, long caused even the name of it to be objected to by many, yet we have as just grounds to expect such a happy event as the Jews had to look for a Messiah; but those who suppose it will be a carnal millennium are as much mistaken as the Jews were in looking for a temporal deliverer. It is our duty to pray for the promised glorious days, and to do every thing in our public and private stations which can be instrumental in preparing the way: even as David made abundant provision for the temple Solomon was to build. When this thousand years will be the event must determine, but the dawn of this glorious day cannot be very distant; and we ought to advert to those things which may prepare the way for it, in the application and improvement of our time and our several talents.—T. Scott, as abridged in R. T. S. Commentary. There are difficulties in every theoretical view that have not yet been cleared up; but there is no difficulty at all in the general truth and in its practical application.—Bickersteth.]

11 And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away; and there was found no place for them. 12 And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and another book was opened, which is the book of life: and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. 13 And the sea gave up the dead which were in it; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them: and they were judged every man according to their works. 14 And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. 15 And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire.

BURYING PLACE AT JERUSALEM.

The utter destruction of the devil's kingdom very properly leads to an account of the day of judgment, which will determine every man's everlasting state. And we may be assured there will be a judgment when we see "the prince of this world is judged," 1 Jno. xvi. 11. This will be a great day, "the great day when all shall appear before the judgment-seat of Christ." The Lord help us firmly to believe this doctrine of the judgment to come! It is a doctrine that made Felix tremble. Here we have a description of it; where observe, 1. We behold the throne and tribunal of judgment, great and white, very glorious, and perfectly just and righteous. The throne of iniquity, that establishes wickedness by a law, has no fellowship with this righteous throne and tribunal. 2. The appearance of the Judge, and that is the Lord Jesus Christ, who then puts on such majesty and terror, that "the earth and the heaven fled from his face, and there was no place found for them;" there is a dissolution of the whole frame of nature, 2 Pet. iii. 10. 3. The persons to be judged; ver. 12, "The dead, small and great," both young and old, low and high, poor and rich; none so mean but they have some talents to account for, and none so great as to avoid the jurisdiction of this court. Not only those that are found alive at the coming of Christ, but all that have died before; the grave shall surrender the bodies of men, hell shall surrender the souls of the wicked, the sea shall surrender the many that seemed to have been lost in it. All these are the King's prisons, and he will cause them to set forth their prisoners. 4. The rule of judgment settled: "The books were opened." What books? Why, the book of God's omniscience, who is greater than our consciences, and knows all things (there is a book of remembrance with him both for good and bad); and the book of the sinner's conscience, which, though formerly secret, will now be opened. And another book shall be opened—the book of the Scriptures—the statute-book of heaven, the rule of life. This book is opened as containing the law,—the touchstone by which the hearts and lives of men are to be tried. This book determines matter of right, the other books give evidence of matters of fact. Some, by the other book, called "the book of life," understand the book of God's eternal counsels; but that does not seem to belong to the affair of judgment. In eternal election God does not act judicially, but with absolute sovereign freedom. 5. The cause to be tried, and that is, the works of men; what they have done, and whether it be good or evil. "By their works men shall be justified or condemned;" for though God knows their state and their principles, and looks chiefly at these, yet, being to approve himself to angels and men as a righteous God, he will try their principles by their practices, and so will "be justified when he speaks and clear when he judges." 6. The issue of the trial and judgment, and that will be according to the evidence of fact and rule of judgment. All those that have made a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell, shall then be condemned with their infernal confederates, cast with them into the lake of fire, as not being entitled to eternal life, according to the rules of life laid down in the Scripture; but those whose names are written in that book, that is, those who are justified and acquitted by the Gospel, shall then be justified and acquitted by the Judge, and shall enter into eternal life, having nothing more to fear from death or hell, or wicked men; for these are all destroyed together. Let it be our great concern to see on what terms we or rather to "the war;" of the words "Gog and Magog" no very satisfactory derivation has been proposed. Some derive them from a Persian word signifying "mountain," in which case the reference would be to the Caucasian range. The terms Gogh and Mogh are still applied to some of the heights on that range. In the Koran, Gog and Magog are localised north of the Caucasus. There appears to have been from the earliest times a legend that the enemies of religion and civilisation lived in that quarter.

xx. 13. "Death and hell;" rather, "death and hades." So also in verse 14.

xx. 14. "This is the second death:" all the ancient MSS. add "the lake of fire."

xxi. 3. "Voice out of heaven:" the oldest MSS. read here "out of the throne." The closing part of the verse gains force if we omit the words in italics, and read, "He shall be with them, the God."

stand with our Bibles, whether they justify us or condemn us now; for the Judge of all will proceed by that rule. Christ shall judge the secrets of all men according to the Gospel. Happy are they that have so ordered and stated their cause according to the Gospel as to know beforehand that they shall be justified in the great day of the Lord!

CHAPTER XXI.

Hitherto the prophecy of this book has presented to us a very remarkable mixture of light and shade, prosperity and adversity, mercy and judgment, in the conduct of Divine providence towards the church in the world. Now, at the close of all, the day breaks, and the shadows flee away. A new world now appears, the former being passed away. Some are willing to understand all that is said in these last two chapters, of the state of the church even here on earth, in the glory of the latter days; but others, more probably, take it as a representation of the perfect and triumphant state of the church in heaven. Let but the faithful saints and servants of God wait a while, and they shall not only see, but enjoy, the perfect holiness and happiness of that world. In this chapter you have, I. An introduction to the vision of the new Jerusalem, ver. 1—9. II. The vision itself, ver. 10 to the end.

AND I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea. 2 And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. 3

And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. 4 And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain: for the former things are passed away. 5 And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write: for these words are true and faithful. 6 And he said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely. 7 He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son. 8 But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death.

We have here a more general account of the happiness of the church of God in the future state, which it seems most safe to understand the heavenly state.

First. A new world now opens to our view; ver. 1. "I saw a new heaven and a new earth;" that is, a new universe; for we suppose the world to be made up of heaven and earth. By the new earth we may understand a new state for the bodies of men, as well as a heaven for their souls. This world is not now newly created, but newly opened, and filled with all those that were the heirs of it. The new heaven and the new earth will not then be distinct; the very earth of the saints, their glorified bodies, will now be spiritual and heavenly, and suited to those pure and bright mansions. To make way for the commencement of this new world, the old world, with all its troubles and commotions, "passed away."

Secondly. In this new world the apostle saw "the holy city," the new Jerusalem, coming down from heaven; not locally, but as to its original. This new Jerusalem is the church of God in its new and perfect state, "prepared as a bride adorned for her husband," beautified with all perfection of wisdom and holiness, meet for the full fruition of the Lord Jesus Christ in glory.

Thirdly. The blessed presence of God with his people is here proclaimed and admired: "I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men," &c., ver. 3. Observe, 1. The presence of God with his church is the glory of the church. 2. It is matter of wonder that a holy God should ever dwell with any of the children of men. 3. That the presence of God with his people in heaven will not be interrupted, as it is on earth, but he will dwell with them continually. 4. That the covenant, interest, and relation that there is now between God and his people will be filled up and perfected in heaven; "they shall be his people," their souls shall be assimilated to him, filled with all the love, honour, and delight in God that their relation to him requires. This shall be their perfect holiness, and he will be their God. God himself will be their God; his immediate presence with them, his love fully manifested to them, and his glory put upon them, will be their perfect happiness; then he will fully answer the character of the relation on his part, as they shall do on their part.

Fourthly. This new and blessed state will be free from all trouble and sorrow. For, 1. All the effects of former trouble shall be done away. They have been often before in tears, by reason of sin, of affliction, of the calamities of the church; but now "all tears shall be wiped away," no signs, no remembrance of former sorrows shall remain, any farther than to make their present felicity the greater. God himself, as their tender Father, with his own kind hand, shall wipe away the tears of his children; and they would not have been without those tears when God shall come and wipe them away. 2. All the causes of future sorrow shall be for ever removed; "there shall be neither death nor pain," and therefore "no sorrow nor crying." These are things incident to that state in which they were before, but now all former things are passed away.

Fifthly. The truth and certainty of this blessed state is ratified by the word and promise of God, and ordered to be committed to writing, as matter of perpetual record, ver. 6, 7. The subject matter of this vision is so great, and of so great importance to the church and people of God, that they have need of the most full assurances of it; and God, therefore, from heaven repeats and ratifies the truth thereof. And besides, many ages must pass between the time when this vision was given forth and the accomplishment of it, and many great trials must intervene; and therefore God would have it committed to writing, for perpetual memory, and continual use to his people. Observe, 1. The certainty of the promise averred; "These words are faithful and true;" and it follows, "It is done," as sure as if it were done already. We may and ought to take God's promise as present payment; if he has said he makes all things new, it is done. 2. He gives us his titles of honour as a pledge or surety of the full performance, even those titles of Alpha and Omega, "the beginning and the end." As it was his glory that he gave the rise and beginning to the world and to his church, it will be his glory to finish the work begun, and not to leave it imperfect. As his power and will was the first cause of all things, his pleasure and glory is the last end; and he will not lose his design, for then he should no longer be the Alpha and Omega. Men may begin designs which they can never bring to perfection; but the counsel of God shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure. 3. The desires of his people towards this blessed state are another evidence of the truth and certainty of it. They thirst after a state of sinless perfection, and the uninterrupted enjoyment of God; and God has wrought in them these longing desires which cannot be satisfied with any thing else, and therefore would be the torment of the soul if they were disappointed. But it would be inconsistent with the goodness of God and his love to his people to create in them holy and heavenly desires, and then deny them their proper satisfaction. And, therefore, they may be assured, when they have overcome their present difficulties, "he will give them of the fountain of the water of life freely."

Sixthly. The greatness of this future felicity is declared and illustrated, 1. By the freeness of it. It is the free gift of God; he gives of the "water of life freely." This will not make it less, but more grateful to his people. 2. The fulness of it. The people of God then lie at the fountain-head of all blessedness; they "inherit all things," ver. 7. Enjoying God, they enjoy all things. He is all in all. 3. By the tenure and title by which they enjoy this blessedness, by right of inheritance, as the sons of God,—a title, of all others, the most honourable, as resulting from so near and endeared a relation to God himself, and the most sure and indefeasible, that can no more cease than the relation from which it results. 4. By the vastly different state of the wicked. Their misery helps to illustrate the glory and blessedness of the saints, and the distinguishing goodness of God towards them, ver. 8; where observe, 1st. The sins of those that perish; among which are first mentioned their cowardliness and unbelief. The fearful lead the van in this black list; they durst not encounter the difficulties of religion, and their slavish fear proceeded from their unbelief. But those that were so dastardly as not to dare to take up the cross of Christ, and discharge their duty to him, were yet so desperate as to run into all manner of abominable wickedness,—murder, adultery, sorcery, idolatry, and lying. 2nd. Their punishment; they "have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." First. They could not burn at a stake for Christ, but they must burn in hell for sin. Secondly. They must die another death after their natural death. The agonies and terrors of the first death will consign them over to the far greater terrors and agonies of eternal death,—to die, and to be always dying. Thirdly. This misery will be their proper part and portion, what they have justly deserved, what they have in effect chosen, and what they have prepared themselves for by their sins. Thus the misery of the damned will illustrate the blessedness of those that are saved, and their blessedness will aggravate the other's misery.

9 And there came unto me one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. 10 And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God. 11 Having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as crystal; 12 And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel: 13 On the east three gates; on the north three gates; on the south three gates; and on the west three gates. 14 And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb. 15 And he that talked with me had

xxi. 7. "All things:" the best MSS. have not "all things," but "these things." "His God . . . my son:" rather, "I will be to him a God, and he shall be to me a son."

xxi. 11. "Having the glory of God:" there is doubtless here an allusion to the Shechinah, but more is meant.

xxi. 18. "The building of the wall of it:" Alford renders, "the masonry of the wall of it."

xxi. 19, 20. The arrangement of stones here is not the same as in the high-priest's breastplate. Here they are arranged according to their various shades of colour. It has been thought that chrysoprasus is probably an error for chrysopaston, a dark blue stone studded with gold, as Marbodius has understood. By this substitution, all the shades of blue will follow each other. (Compare Note on chap. iv. 3.) "Sapphire," probably the lapis lazuli, an opaque blue stone. "Emerald," or smaragdus, bright transparent green. "Jacinth," or hyacinthus, is the sky-blue sapphire.

a golden reed to measure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof. 16 And the city lieth foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth: and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal. 17 And he measured the wall thereof, an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the measure of a man, that is, of the angel. 18 And the building of the wall of it was of jasper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glass. 19 And the foundations of the wall of the city were garnished with all manner of precious stones. The first foundation was jasper; the second, sapphire; the third, a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald; 20 The fifth, sardonyx; the sixth, sardius; the seventh, chrysolite; the eighth, beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chrysoprasus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyst. 21 And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every several gate was of one pearl: and the street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass.

We have already considered the introduction to the vision of the new Jerusalem in a more general idea of the heavenly state; we now come to the vision itself; where observe,

First. The person that opened the vision to the apostle; "One of the seven angels that had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues," ver. 9. God has a variety of work and employment for his holy angels. Sometimes they are to sound the trumpet of Divine providence, and give fair warning to a careless world; sometimes they are to pour out the vials of God's anger upon impenitent sinners; and sometimes to discover things of a heavenly nature to those that are the heirs of salvation; and they readily execute every commission they receive from God. And when this world shall be at an end, yet the angels shall be employed by the great God in proper, pleasant work to all eternity.

Secondly. The place from which the apostle had this glorious view and prospect; he was taken in ecstasy into "a high mountain." From such situations men usually have the most distinct views of adjacent cities. They that would have clear views of heaven must get as near heaven as they can, into the mount of vision, the mount of meditation and faith, from whence, as from the top of Pisgah, they may behold the goodly land of the heavenly Canaan.

Thirdly. The subject matter of the vision; "The bride, the Lamb's wife," ver. 10; that is, the church of God in her glorious, perfect, triumphant state, under the resemblance of Jerusalem, having the glory of God shining in its lustre as uxor splendet radiis mariti,—"comely through his comeliness put upon her," glorious in her relation to Christ, and in his image now perfected in her, and his favour shining upon her. And now we have a large description of the church triumphant under the emblem of a city, far exceeding in riches and splendour all the cities of this world. And this new Jerusalem is here represented to us both in the exterior and interior part of it.

I. The exterior part of the city, the wall and the gates; the wall for security, and the gates for entrance.

1. The wall for security. Heaven is a safe state; those that are there are enclosed with a wall, that separates them and secures them from all evils and enemies. Now here, in the account of the wall, we observe, 1st. The height of it, which we are told is very high—"seventy yards," ver. 17, sufficient both for ornament and security. 2nd. The matter of it; "It was as jasper;" a wall all built of the most precious stones for firmness and lustre, ver. 11. This city has a wall that is impregnable as well as precious. 3rd. The form of it was very regular and uniform; it was foursquare, the length as large as the breadth. In the new Jerusalem all shall be equal in purity and perfection. There shall be an absolute uniformity in the church triumphant; a thing wanted and wished for on earth, but not to be expected till we come to heaven. 4th. The measure of the wall: ver. 15, 16, "Twelve thousand furlongs" each way, each side, which is forty-eight thousand furlongs in the whole compass, or fifteen hundred German miles. Here is room sufficient for all the people of God; many mansions in their Father's house. 5th. The foundation of the wall, for heaven is a city that hath her foundations, ver. 19. The promise and power of God, and the purchase of Christ, are the strong foundations of the church's safety and happiness. The foundations are described by their number and by their matter. By their number, twelve, alluding to the twelve apostles, ver. 14, whose gospel doctrines are the foundations upon which the church is built, Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. And as to the matter of these foundations, it was various and precious, set forth by twelve sorts of precious stones, denoting the variety and excellency of the doctrines of the Gospel, or of the graces of the Holy Spirit, or the personal excellencies of the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. The gates for entrance. Heaven is not inaccessible; there is a way opened into the holiest of all; there is a free admission to all those that are sanctified; they shall not find themselves shut out. Now, as to the gates, observe, 1st. Their number; they are "twelve gates," answering to the twelve tribes of Israel. All the true Israel of God shall have entrance into the new Jerusalem, as every tribe had into the earthly Jerusalem. 2nd. Their guards which were placed upon them; "twelve angels," to admit and receive the several tribes of the spiritual Israel, and to keep out others. 3rd. The inscription on the gates; "The names of the twelve tribes;" to shew they have a right to the tree of life, and to enter through the gates into the city. 4th. The situation of the gates. As the city had four equal sides, answering to the four quarters of the world,—east, west, north, and south; so in each side there were three gates, signifying that from all quarters of the earth there shall be some that shall get safe to heaven, and be received there, and that there is as free entrance from one part of the world as from the other; for in Christ there is neither Jew, nor Greek, barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free; men of all nations and languages, that believe on Christ, have, by him, access to God in grace here, and in glory hereafter. 5th. The materials of these gates. They were all of pearls, and yet with great variety, "every gate one pearl;" either one single pearl of that vast bigness, or one single sort of pearl. Christ is the pearl of great price, and he is our way to God. There is nothing magnificent enough in this world fully to set forth the glory of heaven. Could we in the glass of a strong imagination contemplate such a city as is here described, even as to the exterior part of it,—such a wall, and such gates,—how amazing, how glorious would the prospect be! and yet this but a faint and dim representation of what heaven is in itself!

22 And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it. 23 And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. 24 And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it. 25 And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there. 26 And they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it. 27 And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

II. Now we come to take a view of the interior part of the new Jerusalem. You have seen its strong wall, and stately gates, and glorious guards; now we are to be led through the gates into the city itself.

1. And the thing which we observe there is the street of the city, which was pure gold, like transparent glass, ver. 21. The saints in heaven tread upon gold. The new Jerusalem has its several streets. There is the most exact order in heaven: every saint has his proper mansion. There is converse in heaven; the saints are then at rest, but it is not a mere passive rest; it is not a state of sleep and inactivity, but a state of delightful motion. The nations that are saved walk in the light of it; they walk with Christ in white; they have communion, not only with God, but with one another; and all their steps are firm and clean. They are pure and clear as gold and transparent glass.

2. The temple of the new Jerusalem, which was no material temple, made with men's hands, as that of Solomon, and Zerubbabel, but a temple altogether spiritual and divine. "For the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb are the temple" thereof. There the saints are above the need of ordinances, which were the means of their preparation for heaven. When the end is attained, the means are no longer useful. Perfect and immediate communion with God will more than supply the place of gospel institutions.

3. The light of this city. Where there is no light there can be no lustre, nor pleasure. Heaven is "the inheritance of the saints in light." But what is that light? There is no sun nor moon shining there, ver. 23. Light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is to behold the sun. What a dismal world would this be if it were not for the light of the sun! What is there in heaven that supplies the want of it? Why, there is no want of the light of the sun, for the glory of God lightens that city, "and the Lamb is the light thereof." God in Christ will be an everlasting fountain of knowledge and joy to the saints in heaven; and, if so, there is no need of the sun or moon, no more than we here need to set up candles at noon-day, when the sun shineth in its strength.

4. The inhabitants of this city. They are described here several ways: 1st. By their numbers. Here are whole nations of saved souls; some out of all nations, and many out of some nations. All those multitudes that were sealed on earth are saved in heaven. 2nd. By their dignity; some of the kings and princes of the earth: great kings. God will have some of all ranks and degrees of men to fill the heavenly mansions; high and low. And when the greatest kings come to heaven, they will see all their former honour and glory swallowed up of this heavenly glory that so much excels. 3rd. Their continual accession and entrance into this city; the gates shall never be shut. There is no night, and therefore no need of shutting up the gates. Some one or other are coming in every hour and moment; and those that are sanctified always find the gates open; they have an abundant entrance into the kingdom.

5. The accommodations of this city. All the glory and honour of the nations shall be brought into it; whatever is excellent and valuable in this world shall be there enjoyed in a more refined kind, and to a far greater degree. Brighter crowns, a better and more enduring substance, more sweet and satisfying feasts, a more glorious attendance, a truer sense of honour, and far higher posts of honour; a more glorious temper of mind, and a more glorious form and countenance, than ever was known in this world.

6. The unmixt purity of all that belong to the new Jerusalem, ver. 27. 1st. There the saints shall have no impure thing remain in them. In the article of death they shall be cleansed from every thing that is of a defiling nature. Now they feel a sad mixture of corruption with their graces, which hinder them in the service of God, and interrupt their communion with him, and intercept the light of his countenance; but at their entrance into the holy of holies they are washed in the laver of Christ's blood, and presented to the Father without spot. 2nd. There the saints shall have no impure persons admitted among them; in the earthly Jerusalem there will be a mixed communion after all the care that can be taken. Some roots of bitterness will spring up to trouble and defile Christian societies, but in the new Jerusalem there is a society perfectly pure. First. Free from such as are openly profane. There are none admitted into heaven that work abominations. In the churches on earth sometimes abominable things are done, solemn ordinances profaned and prostituted to men openly vicious, for worldly ends; but no such abominations can have place in heaven. Secondly. Free from hypocrites, such as make lies, say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie. These will creep into the churches of Christ on earth, and may lie concealed there a long time, perhaps

xxi. 22. "No temple therein:" while on earth the bodies of Christ-loving men are called the temples of God the Holy Ghost, in the perfected state, in the new Jerusalem, God himself is their Temple. (Compare 1 Cor. iii. 17.)

xx. 24. "The nations of them which are saved:" the words "of them which are saved" are not found in any of the most ancient MSS. "In the light of it:" rather, "by means of the light thereof."

xxii. 2. Translate, "In the midst of the street of it (the city) and of the river, on one side and on the other," &c.; the meaning being that the trees were on each side, in the middle space between the street and the river. Compare Ezek. xlvii. 12, from which we assume that several trees of one kind are meant by the "tree of life."

xxii. 3. "Curse:" i.e., accursed thing. "There shall no more be those accursed things which bar the residence of God among his people. See Josh. vii. 12, which shows that these words are in close connection with what follows" (Alford).

all their days; but they cannot intrude into the new Jerusalem which is wholly reserved for those that are called, and chosen, and faithful; who are all written, not only in the register of the visible church, but "in the Lamb's book of life."

CHAPTER XXII.

In this chapter we have, I. A further description of the heavenly state of the church, ver. 1—5. II. A confirmation of this and all other visions of this book, ver. 6—19. III. The conclusion, ver. 20, 21.

AND he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. 2 In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month: and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. 3 And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him: 4 And they shall see his face: and his name shall be in their foreheads. 5 And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.

The heavenly state which was before described as a city, and called the new Jerusalem, is here described as a paradise, alluding to the earthly paradise which was lost by the sin of the first Adam. Here is another paradise restored by the second Adam. A paradise in a city! or a whole city in a paradise! In the first paradise there were only two persons to behold the beauty and taste the pleasures of it; but in this second paradise whole cities and nations shall find abundant delight and satisfaction. And here observe,

First. The river of paradise. The earthly paradise was well watered; no place can be pleasant or fruitful that is not so. This river is described, 1. By its fountain-head; "the throne of God and the Lamb." All our springs, both of grace, comfort, and glory, are in God; and all our streams from him, through the mediation of the Lamb. 2. By its quality; "pure, and clear as crystal." All the streams of earthly comforts are muddy; but these are clear, and salutary, and refreshing: giving life, and preserving life, to those that drink of it.

Secondly. "The tree of life" in this paradise. Such a tree there was in the earthly paradise, Gen. ii. 3. This far excels it. And now, as to this tree, observe, 1. The situation of it; "in the midst of the street," and on either side the river; or, as it might have been better rendered, "in the midst between the terrace-walk and the river." This tree of life is fed by the pure waters of the river that comes from the throne of God. The presence and perfections of God furnish out all the glory and blessedness of heaven. 2. The fruitfulness of this tree. 1st. It brings forth many sorts of fruit; twelve sorts, suited to the refined taste of all the saints. 2nd. It brings forth fruit at all times; yieldeth its fruit every month. This tree is never empty, never barren; there is always fruit upon it. In heaven there is not only a variety of pure and satisfying pleasures, but a continuance of them, and always fresh. 3rd. The fruit is not only pleasant, but wholesome. The presence of God in heaven is the health and happiness of the saints; there they find in him a remedy for all their former maladies, and are preserved by him in the most healthful and vigorous state.

Thirdly. The perfect freedom of this paradise from every thing that is evil; ver. 3. "There shall be no more curse;" no accursed one, καταναίμενα, no serpent there, as there was in the earthly paradise. Here is the great excellency of this paradise, the devil has nothing to do there; he cannot draw the saints from serving God to be subject to himself, as he did our first parents; nor can he so much as disturb them in the service of God.

Fourthly. The supreme felicity of this paradisaical state. 1. There the saints shall see the face of God; there they shall enjoy the beatific vision. 2. God will own them, as having his seal and name on their foreheads. 3. They shall reign with him for ever; their service shall be not only freedom, but honour and dominion. 4. All this shall be with perfect knowledge and joy. They shall be full of wisdom and comfort, continually walking in the light of the Lord; and this not for a time, but "for ever and ever."

6 And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true: and the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly be done. 7 Behold, I come quickly: blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book. 8 And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things.

9 Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God. 10 And he saith unto me, Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand. 11 He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still. 12 And, behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be. 13 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last. 14 Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city. 15 For without are dogs, and sorcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie. 16 I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star. 17 And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. 18 For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book: 19 And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.

We have here a solemn ratification of the contents of this book, and particularly of this last vision, though some think it may not only refer to the whole book, but to the whole New Testament, yea, to the whole Bible, completing and confirming the canon of Scripture. And here, 1. This is confirmed by the name and nature of that God that gave out these discoveries; he is "the Lord God, faithful and true," and so are all his sayings. 2. By the messengers he chose to reveal these things to the world; the holy angels shewed them to the holy men of God; and God would not employ his saints and angels in deceiving the world. 3. They will soon be confirmed by their accomplishment; they are things that must shortly be done. Christ will make haste, he will come quickly, and put all things out of doubt; and then they will prove the wise and happy men that have believed and kept his words. 4. By the integrity of that angel that had been the apostle's guide and interpreter in these visions; and that integrity was such as that he not only refused to accept religious adoration from John, but once and again reproved him for it. He who was so tender of the honour of God, and so displeased with what was a wrong to God, would never come in his name to lead the people of God into mere dreams and delusions; and it still is a farther confirmation of the sincerity of this apostle that he confesses his own sin and folly into which he had now again relapsed, and he leaves this his failing on perpetual record; and this shews he was a faithful and an impartial writer. 5. By the order given to leave the book of the prophecy open, to be perused by all, that they might labour to understand it, that they might make their objections against it, and compare the prophecy with the events. God here deals freely and openly with all; he does not speak in secret, but calls every one to witness to the declarations here made, ver. 10. 6. By the effect this book thus kept open will have upon men; those that are filthy and unjust will take occasion from thence to be more so, but it will confirm, strengthen, and further sanctify those that are upright with God; it will be a savour of life to some and of death to others, and so will appear to be from God, ver. 12. 7. It will be Christ's rule of judgment at the great day; he will dispense rewards and punishments to men according as their works agree or disagree with the word of God; and therefore that word itself must needs be faithful and true. 8. It is the word of Him who is the author, finisher, and rewarder of the faith and holiness of his people, ver. 13, 14. He is "the first and the last," and the same from first to last, and so is his word too; and he will by this word give to his people that conform themselves to it, "a right to the tree of life," and an entrance into heaven; and this will be a full confirmation of the truth and authority of his word, since it contains the title and evidence of that confirmed state of holiness and happiness that remains for his people in heaven. ["Alpha and Omega" &c. This and other like passages incontrovertibly refer to Christ, and according to the known signification of the Jewish expressions, they declare his absolute perfection, his perpetual xxii. 4. "Not only shall they personally and in secret (chap. ii. 17) know their sonship, but they shall be known as sons of God to all the citizens of the New Jerusalem, so that the free flow of mutual love among the members of Christ's family will not be checked by suspicion, as here."

xxii. 6 "Holy prophets;" rather, "spirits of the prophets;" their spirits being taught by the Spirit of God, and so made the means of instructing others. "Shortly;" see chap. i. 1.

xxii. 10. Compare Dan. viii. 26, xii. 4, 9, where the command is the reverse, as the days are many.

xxii. 11. Alford says, "See Ezek. iii. 27. Compare Matt. xxvi. 45. The saying has solemn irony in it; the time is so short that there is hardly room for change; the lesson conveyed in its depth is 'change while there is time.'" "Be unjust . . . filthy . . . righteous:" rather, "commit injustice . . . pollute himself . . . do righteousness."

presence and protection; and that he is the Author, the effective agent, and the end of the scheme of providential government with respect to the church, which forms the subject of the prophetic books. To perceive their force, we should compare them with the like terms in the Old Testament applied to Jehovah.—J. P. Smith. 9. It is a book that condemns and excludes from heaven all wicked, unrighteous persons, and particularly those that love and make lies, ver. 15, and therefore can never be itself a lie. 10. It is confirmed by "the testimony of Jesus, which is the Spirit of prophecy." And this Jesus, as God, is "the root of David," though, as man, his offspring,—a person in whom all uncreated and created excellencies meet; too great and too good to deceive his churches and the world. He is the fountain of all light, "the bright and the morning star;" and as such has given to his churches this morning light of prophecy, to assure them of the light of that perfect day that is approaching. 11. It is confirmed by an open and general invitation to all to come and partake of the promises and privileges of the Gospel, those streams of the water of life. These are tendered to all that feel in their souls a thirst which nothing in this world can quench. [Such a declaration of free grace seems inserted just in the close of the sacred canon to encourage the hope of every humble soul that is truly desirous of the blessings of the Gospel, and to guard against any suspicious of the Divine goodness. The word we render 'take' often signifies 'receive,' and the word 'freely' is as much as 'gratis,' which implies the freedom of the gift, and probably refers to the invitation, Isa. lv. 1.—Doddridge.] 12. It is confirmed by the joint testimony of the Spirit of God, and that gracious Spirit that is in all the true members of the church of God; "the Spirit and the bride" join in testifying the truth and excellency of the Gospel. 13. It is confirmed by a most solemn sanction, condemning and cursing all that should dare to corrupt or change the word of God, either by adding to it or taking from it, ver. 18, 19. He that adds to the word of God draws down upon himself "all the plagues written in this book;" and he that takes any thing away from it cuts himself off from all the promises and privileges of it. This sanction is like a flaming sword to guard the canon of the Scripture from profane hands. Such a fence as this God set about the law (Deu. iv. 2) and the whole Old Testament (Mal. iv. 4), and now in the most solemn manner about the whole Bible, assuring us that it is a book of the most sacred nature, Divine authority, and of the last importance, and therefore the peculiar care of the great God.

20 He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly. Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus. 21 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

We are now come to the conclusion of the whole; and that in three things, 1. Christ's farewell to his church. He seems now, after he had been discovering these things to his people on earth, to take leave of them, and return to heaven; but he parts with them in great kindness, and assures them that it shall not be long before he comes again to them: "Behold, I come quickly." As when he ascended into heaven, after his resurrection, he parted with a promise of his gracious presence, so here he parts with a promise of a speedy return. If any say, Where is the promise of his coming, when so many ages are now past since this was written? let them know he is not slack to his people, but long-suffering to his enemies: his coming will be sooner than they are aware, sooner than they are prepared, sooner than they desire; and to his people it will be seasonable. The vision is for an appointed time, and will not tarry. He will "come quickly;" let this word be always sounding in our ear, and let us give all diligence that we may be found of him in peace, "without spot and blameless." 2. The church's hearty echo to Christ's promise. 1st. Declaring her firm belief of it: "Amen," so it is, so it shall be. 2nd. Expressing her earnest desire of it: "Even so, come, Lord Jesus;" make haste, my beloved, and be thou like a roe, or like a young hart on the mountains of spices. Thus beats the pulse of the church, thus breathes that gracious Spirit, which actuates and informs the mystical body of Christ; and we should never be satisfied till we find such a spirit breathing in us, and causing us to look for the blessed hope and glorious appearance of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. This is the language of the church of the first-born, and we should join with them, often putting ourselves in mind of his promise. What comes from heaven in a promise should be sent back to heaven in a prayer. "Come, Lord Jesus;" put an end to this state of sin, sorrow, and temptation; gather thy people out of this present evil world, and take them up to heaven, that state of perfect purity, peace and joy, and so finish thy great design, and fulfil all that word in which thou hast caused thy people to hope. 3. The apostolical benediction, which closes the whole: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, Amen." Where observe, 1st. The Bible ends with a clear proof of the God-head of Christ, since the Spirit of God teaches the apostle to bless his people in the name of Christ, and to beg from Christ a blessing for them, which is a proper act of adoration. 2nd. Nothing should be more desired by us than that the grace of Christ may be with us in this world, to prepare us for the glory of Christ in the other world. It is by his grace that we must be kept in a joyful expectation of his glory, and fitted for it, and preserved to it; and his glorious appearance will be welcome and joyful to those that are partakers of his grace and favour here; and therefore to this most comprehensive prayer we should all add our hearty Amen, most earnestly thirsting after greater measures of the gracious influences of the blessed Jesus in our souls, and his gracious presence with us, till glory has perfected all his grace towards us; for he is a sun and a shield; he gives grace and glory, and no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. SMYRNA.—THE SCENE OF POLYCARP'S MARTYRDOM.

"Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life."

 xxii. 14. "Do his commandments:" according to another rendering adopted by Alford, "that wash their robes."
 xxii. 15. "Dogs:" impure and filthy persons. (See Phil. iii. 2; Psa. xxii. 16; Matt. vii. 6.)
 xxii. 16. "Root of David," as being Jehovah; "the offspring of David," as man; "the bright and morning star," as he who is the light of the world and herald of the everlasting day.
 xxii. 17. This verse had perhaps better be regarded as the words of the apostle himself, in answer to what has just been said by our Lord.
 xxii. 18. "This is at least an awful warning both to those who despise and neglect this book, and to those who add to it by irrelevant and trifling interpretations" (Alford).
 xxii. 20. "Amen;" join this with the words following, the whole being St. John's reply to the words immediately preceding, as addressed by the Lord Jesus.

Supplementary Note.—Of the interpretation of the book there are different views. Some regard all the visions as long since accomplished. These, usually spoken of as the Præterist School, claim among their supporters Grotius, Hammond, the learned and eloquent Bossuet, Eichhorn, Ewald, Lücke, in Germany; Professor Stuart, of America; and in this country the late lamented Professor Maurice and Professor Lee. Others, who go by the name of the Futurist

School, affirm that the main portion, if not the whole of the predictions, remain to be fulfilled. Among the adherents of this view, which must be regarded as modern, are to be found Dr. Todd, the two Maitlands, Williams, and De Burgh. The Historical interpreters view the visions as unfolding the destinies and fortunes of the Church from the earliest times till the end of time. Mede, Sir Isaac Newton, Vitringa, and Bengel were adherents of this view; and in our own time Hengstenberg and Eorard among German, Faber and Bishop Wordsworth among English expositors have adopted it, but the most weighty support to it has been given by Elliott. His learned and painstaking Commentary is a very armoury for the historical interpreter; and his expositions will never fail to command the respectful attention which is due to one who has dedicated his life to one great object, and whose unrequited labours have been rewarded with the noble honour of having cleared away encumbrances from a path which many yearned to tread. Against these three schools of interpretation it is easy to find objections, and perhaps as easy to find supporting evidence. It seems, for example, hard to believe with the Præterist that the counselling voice of prophecy should have spoken only of immediate dangers, and left the Church for fifteen centuries unwarned; or with the Futurist to believe that eighteen centuries of the eventful history of the Church are passed over in silence, and that the whole weight of inspired warning was reserved for the few closing years of the dispensation. Nor, on the other hand,

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE TO THE REVELATION.

[Not a few writers on the Apocalypse have applied the vials (ch. xv. and xvi.) to the times in which they respectively lived—recent authors to the revolution in France in 1792, both in its causes and effects, especially as seen in the dreadful events attendant upon, and in the long and bloody wars occasioned by, it. With reference to such systems, Mr. Scott remarks, 'Not being disposed to controvert this interpretation, and much less to subscribe to it, I only again observe that, in my view, our posterity at the end of this century will be more competent judges of this subject than we can be.' Adopting the latter opinion, we deem it right, instead of entering into historical details supposed to be illustrative of the pouring out of the vials, to lay down a few general principles drawn from the word of God, by which we may be guided in the interpretation, both of the events alluded to, and of the extraordinary changes now in progress, and of those still more mighty, which, in the judgment of wise and pious men, are not far remote. The truly great Jonathan Edwards, in his History of the Work of Redemption, written upwards of seventy years ago, divides the duration of that history into three periods; the First, from the fall to the incarnation of Christ; the Second, the period of Christ's humiliation; and the Third, from Christ's resurrection to the end of the world. Respecting this latter he observes, that the design of the Son of God, in his humiliation, was to lay ground for the overthrow of Satan's kingdom, and that now is come the period for effecting it, "Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world be cast out," 1 Jno. xii. 31; that another part of the Divine purpose was to gather together in one all things in Christ, and that now is come the time for this also, Jno. xii. 32, compared with Gen. xlix. 10; and that, when his sufferings were finished, and his humiliation perfected, the time in a special sense had arrived for his accomplishing the eternal salvation of his people, Heb. v. 8, 9; and that great ending of all Divine dispensations, the glorifying of the Godhead; Jno. xvii. 1, 2, "These words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee." He farther observes, 1. That the times of the period spoken of—namely, that from the resurrection of Christ to the end of the world—are for the most part those which in the Old Testament are called "the latter days." 2. That the whole of this period is sometimes in Scripture called "the end of the world," 1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. ix. 26; so called because occupied in bringing things to their great end and issue as contemplated by God in all the previous dispensations of his providence, and as consummated in the gradual accomplishment of these dispensations themselves—whence, perhaps, the expression of the apostle, "the ends of the world" are come upon us—not the end, but the ends, in the plural number, as though the world had several endings one after another. 3. That the state of things which is attained in the events of this period is called a new heaven and a new earth, Isa. lvi. 17, 18; Lxvi. 22; see also, li. 16. For we have seen, as the former state of things, or the old world, by one step after another, is through this period coming to an end, so the new state of things, or the new world, which is a spiritual world, is beginning and setting up—the heaven and earth which are corruptible are shaking, that the new heaven and new earth, which cannot be shaken, may be established and remain, Hag. ii. 6, 7; Heb. xii. 26, 27. Jonathan Edwards proceeds to say, The waters of the long channel, which has so many branches, and so many turnings, when emptied into their proper ocean, which they had been seeking from the beginning and head of their course, then come to their rest. The end of God's creation of the world was to prepare a kingdom for his Son, the heir of all things; in as far as that kingdom advances in the world, so far are things wound up and settled in their everlasting state, and a period put to the course of things in this changeable scene; yea, so far are the first heavens and the first earth come to an end, and the new heavens and the new earth, the everlasting heaven and earth, established in their room. Having premised these observations, and also that the condition arrived at through the events of this period is the same with that so often referred to by "the kingdom of heaven," or "the kingdom of God," that the expectation of such a kingdom, and the expression used to denote it, seem to have been derived from Dan. ii. 44; vii. 13, 14; that great earthly kingdoms had before existed, the Babylonish, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman; but that Christ came to set up the last kingdom, which is not an earthly, but a heavenly kingdom, "not of this world," Jno. xviii. 36; a kingdom appointed to him by the Father, Lu. xxii. 29; a kingdom begun, in its spiritual state, soon after his resurrection, becoming more perfect on the downfall of antichrist, and rising into that glorious and blessed state into which the church shall be received at the day of judgment, 1 Cor. xv. 50, the apostle, in reference to the resurrection, declaring that "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God,"—having, we say, made these preliminary statements, he continues, with a view to the clearer understanding of scripture truth concerning this period, to observe more particularly, 1. That the setting up of the kingdom of Christ is chiefly accomplished by four successive great events, each of which is in Scripture called Christ's "coming in his kingdom"—the first being Christ's appearance in the wonderful dispensations of his providence in the apostle's days, in setting up his kingdom, and destroying its enemies, which ended in the fall of Jerusalem, called, Mat. xvi. 28, (compare Mat. xxvi.) Christ's "coming in his kingdom;" the second being that which was accomplished in Constantine's time, in the destruction of the heathen Roman empire, and is represented as Christ's coming, and compared (ch. vi. to end) to his coming to judgment; the third being his coming at the destruction of antichrist, and so described in Dan. vii., and other places; and the fourth being his coming to the last judgment—the event principally signified in Scripture by Christ's "coming in his kingdom." 2. That each of the three former is a lively image or type of the fourth and last, namely, Christ's coming to the final judgment, as the principal dispensations of Providence, previous to his first advent, were types of that advent. a. As Christ's last coming to judgment is accompanied with a resurrection of the dead, so is each of the three foregoing with a spiritual resurrection, called the first resurrection, (ch. xx.), in reference to the times following the overthrow of antichrist. b. As Christ will appear in the last judgment in the glory of the Father, so it was aforetime, in the judgments he brought upon his enemies; as his last coming will be attended with a literal gathering of the elect from the four winds of heaven, effected by God's angels with a great sound of a trumpet, Mat. xxiv. 31, so each of the preceding had its spiritual ingathering effected by the trumpet of the Gospel, and sounded by the ministers of Christ. c. As on the last appearance of Christ there will be great degeneracy, so it has been with the others—in the opposition to him of the Jews in the heathen persecutions, before Constantine in the wickedness of antichrist, and before the last by Gog and Magog, as described in the Revelation. By each of these comings of Christ God works a glorious deliverance for his church. The first, ending in the fall of Jerusalem, was followed by a blessed spiritual state; at the second there was an advancement to liberty from bloody persecution; the downfall of antichrist will be followed by the prevalence of the truth, liberty, peace, and joy, so often described in prophetic Scripture; and in the last, the church will be advanced to consummate glory in both soul and body in heaven. d. Moreover, each of these comings of Christ is attended with judgment—the Jews were overthrown, so were the heathen persecutors, so will it be with antichrist, the most cruel and unrelenting of all the church's enemies; and so at Christ's final manifestation will the ungodly perish; and, as on each of the former manifestations of Christ, there was, or will be, an ending of the old and a beginning of the new heavens and new earth, so, on his last appearance, there will be an end to a temporal, and the beginning of an eternal state. 3. Each of the four great dispensations is but a step towards the accomplishment of one event—the one event prophesied of Dan. vii. 13, 14; expected by the Jews, and called "the coming of the kingdom of heaven;" referred to by Christ and John the Baptist, when they said, "The kingdom of heaven is at hand," and gradually accomplished in the above dispensations; and because these four events are but images one of another, and the three former, as it were, but types of the last, and all of them together but so many degrees onwards in the accomplishment of the same great end, hence they are all from time to time prophesied of under one, as in Dan., and Mat. xxiv., where some passages appear more applicable to one and some to another of them. 4. In each of these steps the event is being accomplished. There was an advance to it in the destruction of Jerusalem—a greater advance in the time of Constantine, on the fall of antichrist; a farther degree will be approached, so that the kingdom of Christ is gradually prevailing by these several great steps of its fulfilment from the time of Christ's resurrection to the end of the world. 5. And all the great providences of God between these four great events are to make way for the kingdom and glory of Christ in the great event following. It was so before. Those which remain till the overthrow of antichrist, and the beginning of the glorious times of the church which that overthrow will introduce, seem all to prepare the way for that intermediate event; and the providences of God following it seem, in like manner, to be for the greater manifestation of the Redeemer's glory at the end of the world, and in the consummation of all things. Thus far President Edwards.

In regard to the number of periods mentioned in the passage, and the times of their commencement and close, a doubt may be entertained by our readers. But we believe it to present such right general views of the Divine administration as will safely guide us in the interpretation of what is yet hidden in the Apocalypse, so far as we are either designed or qualified, previous to their occurrence, to understand the events therein prefigured. As to these events, there is an extensive and deepening conviction amongst the observers of God's providence and word that the present times carry the elements of a not far distant fulfilment of the predictions uttered in the sixteenth and immediately preceding and following chapters. To this conviction the late Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, gives utterance in a form remarkably coincident, as to the principle enunciated in it, with the Periodical view presented by the great American divine. "I believe," writes Dr. Arnold, (Life, by Stanley, i. 273,) "that the day of the Lord is coming; that is, the termination of one of the great aeons of the human race, whether the final one or not, that I believe no created being knows, or can know. The termination of the Jewish aeon in the first century, and of the Roman aeon in the 500th, was each marked by the same concurring calamitous wars, tumults, pestilences, earthquakes, &c., all marking the time of God's peculiar season of visitation. And society in Europe seems going on fast for a similar revolution, out of which Christ's church will emerge, purified, I trust, and strengthened by the destruction of various earthly and evil mixtures that have corrupted it." In another work the same author observes, "Modern history appears to be not only a step in advance of ancient history, but the last step; it appears to bear marks of the fullness of time, as if there would be no future history beyond it." After some remarkable observations explaining, and in proof of, this opinion, he proceeds,—"We have the full proceeds of earth's resources before us, and they seem inadequate to supply life for a third period of human history. I am well aware that to state this as a matter of positive belief would be the extreme of presumption. There may be nations reserved hereafter for great purposes of God's providence, whose fitness for their appointed work will not betray itself till the work and the time for doing it be come; but, without any presumptuous confidence, if there be any signs, however uncertain, that we are living in the latest period of the world's history, that no other race remain behind to perform what we have neglected, or to restore what we have ruined; then, indeed, the interest of modern history does become intense."—Lectures on Modern History, p. 38. There are other writers who go still farther in this direction. They maintain that the greater part of the seven vials is already poured out—that even the sixth is so, and the way of "the kings of the east" (meaning thereby the Jews) being thus prepared, they will speedily return to the land of their fathers; that the millennium is near, "at the commencement of which Christ will come, and during which he will dwell personally, that is, bodily, on the earth—when his saints that have died shall be raised from the dead, and reign with him, while other men shall be living in their natural bodies upon the earth along with them; that there will be an apostasy after this millennium, and then the day of judgment. And some who hold this view place the conflagration of the heavens and the earth previous to the millennium; while others, I believe, postpone it till the day of judgment. (See fuller statement in Supplementary Note on Jer. xxiii.) The passage in can we be thoroughly satisfied with the Historical School, however ably and learnedly represented. There is a certain nakedness about mere historical fulfilments: the form is there, but we seem to miss the living breath of the Spirit. The fault of the Historical interpreter is that he is too readily caught by the external resemblance, and notes too little inner principles. We are disposed to view the Apocalypse as the pictorial unfolding of great principles in constant conflict, though under various forms. The Præterist may then be right in finding early fulfilments, and the Futurist in expecting undeveloped ones, and the Historical interpreter is unquestionably right in looking for them along the whole line of history; for the words of God mean more than one man or one school of thought can compass. There are depths of truth unexplored which sleep beneath the simplest sentences. Just as we are wont to say that history repeats itself, so the predictions of the Bible are not exhausted in one or even in many fulfilments. Each prophecy is a single key

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE TO THE REVELATION.

Scripture on which this expectation is founded is in Rev. xx. 1-10. It is very extraordinary," says Dr. Carlie of Dublin, in his First and Second Advent, with a View of the Millennium, "that round this solitary symbolical announcement of a thousand years, during which Satan is to be bound in the bottomless pit, have been congregated almost every promise of external glory contained either in the Old or New Testament; and a period of blessedness has thus been held up, during the present transitory, imperfect, sinful state of man, which, has, to a fearful extent, been made to obscure the great promise to which the faith of the church has been directed in all ages, and on which the hope of every individual member of the church rests; namely, the eternal separation of the righteous from the wicked, the destruction of Satan, the abolition of death, and the everlasting peace and joy of all God's people in the presence of God, and the restitution of all things—all to be effected by the second coming of Christ to judgment. On the above passage I would observe, 1. That the events predicted in it, whatever they may be, are to be previous to the coming of Christ for judgment, because the account of the day of judgment immediately follows as part of the same vision, with its essential characteristics,—the destruction of Satan, the sitting of the Son of man on his throne, the judging of the righteous and the wicked, the passing away of the heavens and the earth, the rising of a new heaven and earth, the eternal blessedness of those who were written in the Lamb's book of life, and the eternal banishment of the wicked to outer darkness and torment. The events, then, symbolized in this prophecy belong to our present imperfect condition, and therefore, they cannot be propounded as promises, that is, as objects of faith; nor ought they ever to be confounded with that event which, throughout the whole of Scripture, is held out as the great object of the faith and hope of the church—the second coming of Christ, and the literal resurrection of all the dead. 2. It is to be remembered that this passage is a symbolical vision, and that, before we can decipher it, we must ascertain what the symbols import.—And it does appear to me to be rash and hazardous in the extreme to involve the very essentials of Christianity, the very cardinal points of its doctrine, in the obscurity and uncertainty of such inquiries. Keep these symbolical prophecies apart from the plain declarations of Scripture presented to our faith, and the revelation of God's purposes is clear as light—a child may understand and believe it; intermingling these prophecies with the plain declarations of Scripture, and the whole instantly becomes vague, indistinct, and dubious. 3. In this account of the millennium nothing whatever is said of Christ's coming. But immediately before it there is a description of a personage, who can be no other than the Redeemer, going forth on a white horse, to smite and subdue the nations, followed by the "armies of heaven" on white horses. The armies of heaven seem to point at the messengers of Christ—the preachers of his Gospel—the soldiers of the cross; and it is also confirmed by "the sharp sword," that is, the Word of God, going out of his mouth, and by other parts of the description; so that we are probably to understand by it a wide diffusion of the Gospel by the ordinary means, but with extraordinary power of the Spirit, previous to the binding of Satan. 4. The leading event in this prophecy of the millennium, on which the others seem to depend, is the binding up of Satan for a thousand years. And what might be the effect of the removing of such a powerful stimulant and guide to evil, and of leaving men to meet the offer of mercy in the Gospel simply under the influence of their own natural alienation from God, we cannot clearly anticipate; but it would probably be a more cordial and extensive reception of the Gospel than has ever yet been witnessed. 5. By the reviving of the souls or spirits (for nothing is said of the bodies, be it remembered) of those who were beleaguered by the witness of Jesus, and who had not worshipped the beast, nor received his mark upon their foreheads or on their hands, we may perhaps understand the revival of the principles and faithfulness of the martyrs of the primitive age, and of the age of the Reformation—the manifestation of a similar zeal and faithfulness by the people of God; and their reigning with Christ may signify their being raised to influence and honour in consequence of their union with Christ, their obedience to his law, and their upholding and defending it. 6. But a resurrection is spoken of—a first resurrection, implying a second. This, it has been hastily inferred, must be a literal resurrection of the bodies of part of the saints at the millennium, and called the first resurrection with reference to the final resurrection of saints and sinners at the day of judgment. But no hint is given in the promises, on which our hopes are to be fixed, of any other resurrection than "the resurrection of the last day." Two resurrections are spoken of in Scripture—a spiritual resurrection from the death of trespasses and sins, and the resurrection of the body, which may be called a first and second resurrection. But what is more directly to the point is, that the most graphic description of a resurrection to be found in prophecy certainly does not signify a literal resurrection of the body, but a political and spiritual resurrection of the Jewish nation from its state of dissolution, dismemberment, and corruption (Eze. xxxvii. 1-14). As, then, there is a first and second resurrection of the Jewish nation—one that has already taken place, and another that is yet future,—may not this first resurrection be the first raising up of the world from that state of confusion and spiritual death in which it has been lying since the fall to some measure of peace and order, and subjection to the will of God, which would be effected by the general diffusion and reception of the Gospel, and the withdrawing of Satan's influence? To this period may belong many of the prophecies of the Old Testament, such as the knowledge of the Lord covering the earth as the waters cover the sea; the King of Zion ruling the nations with a rod of iron; the kingdoms of the world becoming the kingdoms of our God and his church; all flesh seeing the salvation of God; the restoration of the Jews to their own land, and their being held in reverence and honour for the sake of Him who was their kinsman according to the flesh. It does not appear that in that universal kingdom of the Redeemer, spoken of in these prophecies, the whole world is to be really converted. A rod of iron is not the sceptre with which Christ governs his people, nor does dashing men in pieces convert them. And then, there are plain indications that the subjection of many will be a feigned subjection—that all are not to be spiritually brought under his rule. But all opposition may be subdued, the law of Christ may be universally acknowledged, the laws of the kingdoms of the world may be founded on the law of God, and administered in accordance with it; wars may cease to the ends of the earth, and the whole structure and practices of society tend to the repression of evil and the encouragement of good. And thus may there be to the world, even during its present imperfect state, what the apostle calls, in reference to the conversion of the Jews, "a life from the dead." (See Note, abridged from T. Scott, on Rev. xx.) 7. By the "rest of the dead" must be meant all besides the martyrs and faithful confessors; namely, those who rejected and opposed the Gospel; and, by their living not again may be meant, that this spirit of opposition to Christ, and rejection of his truth, will be extinct, or at least dormant, during the thousand years of the withdrawing of Satan's influence. 8. By the loosing of Satan must be understood his again being left at liberty to try men's profession of subjection to Christ, by temptation; when, it would appear, that he will succeed in exposing the hypocrisy of some, and exciting the enmity of others, till he shall collect a multitude like the sand of the sea, and engage them in a new and desperate effort to banish the dominion of Christ from the earth. 9. But the provocation is complete. Sin has sufficiently developed itself. The repetition of the old delusion indicates that Satan had done his worst, and had exhausted all his armoury of wicked inventions. The Lord says, It is enough; and Jesus appears in his glory, quashes the diabolical and audacious enterprise, and with it puts an end for ever to the mischief of Satan and his angels, and their human coadjutors. 10. Then follows the second resurrection, implied in the mention of the first, when the earth, after its conflagration, shall come forth from the furnace in renewed beauty, and perform its revolutions under a new and serene sky, from which every portent of wrath and indignation shall be withdrawn; and the saints of God, having been raised in glorious, incorruptible bodies, shall be placed upon it; and Jesus shall come in his glorified body, and dwell and reign among them, and all shall be peace and joy in the worship and service of the Lord for ever and ever. And then, lastly, shall be the second death. What that death shall be we are not left to conjecture. It is mentioned several times in this book in terms which fix it to be the final and utter destruction of the wicked, (Rev. ii. 11; xx. 6, 14; xxi. 2.) In this series of events, the coming of Christ in his power and majesty, the renovation of the earth, the resurrection of the saints in glory, the judging of the quick and the dead, and the final destruction of the wicked, are promises plainly announced in the direct declarations of Scripture, and therefore certainties. The events previous to these, being indicated only by symbolical visions, of difficult interpretation, can assume no higher a place than conjecture; nor is any thing here claimed for them beyond conjectures—perhaps, however, more in accordance with the strains of prophecy than the conjectures of those who are urging upon us a literal personal coming of Christ before the millennium, two literal resurrections, an apostasy, and the subduing of that apostasy, that are to follow the personal coming of Christ,—nay, according to some, that are to follow the conflagration of the heavens and the earth, and thus the erecting upon a single symbolical prophecy, conveyed in vision uncertain in its interpretation, of a whole dispensation after that which is expressly called "the last days."

Whilst entertaining generally the views stated in this passage, we would still not be insensible to the ominous character and events of the present times. But we exceedingly doubt the wisdom of applying to every recent, and still more to every progressive, event the predictions contained in that part of Revelation before alluded to. We therefore prefer giving the views of former writers on the passages in question, when, by comparing these with Scripture, and with surrounding changes, we may be led to apply them with a confidence, all the greater that it has arisen, not from our imagining (as men in every age are apt to do) that recent or passing events fulfil the particular prediction, but from observing their singular accordance with that prediction as commented upon by learned, holy, and discerning men, removed, by their position in another age, from the influence too often injuriously exerted upon the cotemporary interpreter. In this light the following extract from Dr. Owen's (1649) Commentary on Hebrews (xii. 27) appears interesting and important in the present times:—

"The Lord Jesus Christ, by his mighty power, in these latter days, as anti-christian tyranny draws to its period, will so far shake and translate the political heights, governments, and strength of the nations, as shall serve for the full bringing in of his own peaceable kingdom; the nations so shaken becoming thereby a quiet habitation for the people of the Most High. I shall only add that punctual description which you have of this whole matter, as Daniel calls it, in the Revelation, with respect unto its accomplishment, ch. xvii. The Roman harlot having procured ten kings, or kingdoms, into which the last head of the Roman empire sprouted, about the year 450, by the inundation of the northern nations, to join with her, they together make war against the Lamb, ver. 12-14. Ver. 12, 'The ten horns which thou sawest' upon the last head of the great beast, the Roman monarchy, are 'ten kings which have received no kingdom as yet,' to wit, when John saw the vision," but received power as kings one hour with the beast." About four hundred years after this, the pope ascended to his sovereignty, and these western nations grew into distinct dominions about the same time. Ver. 13, 'These have one mind,' that is, as to business in hand, for otherwise they did and do vex one another with perpetual broils and wars; 'and shall give their power and strength to the beast,' or swear to defend rights of holy church, which is no other than Babylon, and act accordingly. Ver. 14, 'These make war with the Lamb,'—having sworn and undertaken the defence of holy church, or Babylon, they persecuted the poor heretics with fire and sword; that is, the witnesses of the Lamb, and in them the Lamb himself, striving to keep his kingdom out of the world; 'and the Lamb shall overcome them,' shaking and translating them into a new mould and frame; 'For he is Lord of lords, and King of kings, and they that are with him,' whose help and endeavors he will use, 'are called, and chosen, and faithful.' Ver. 16, 'The ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast,' being now shaken, changed, or translated in mind, interest, and perhaps government, 'these hate the whore, and shall make her desolate,'—are instrumental in the hand of Christ, for the ruin of that antichristian state, which before they served,—'and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire.' Hence, ch. xviii. 2, Babylon, and that whole antichristian state which was supported upon their power and greatness, having lost its props, comes toppling down to the ground: 'Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen,' ver. 2, and the saints take vengeance on the whore, for all her former rage and cruelty; 'Double unto her double, according to her works,' ver. 6. Ver. 9, 'And the kings of the earth,' being some of them shaken out of their dominions, for refusing to close with the Lamb, 'who have committed fornication and lived deliciously with her,' learning and practising false worship of her institution, 'shall bewail her, and lament for her,' as having received succour from her, her monasteries and shavelings, in their distress, whereunto indeed they were brought for her sake, 'when they shall see the smoke of her burning,' beholding her darkness, stench, and confusion, in her final desolation. Now, all this shall be transacted with so much obscurity and darkness, Christ not only appearing unto carnal eyes, that though 'many shall be purified and made white, yet the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall understand,' Dan. xii. 10. There shall be no such demonstration of the presence of Christ, as to open the eyes of hardened men: but at length, having suffered the poor, deceived wretches to drink of the cup prepared for them, he appears himself gloriously, ch. xix. 13, in a more eminent manner than even before, to the total destruction of the residue of opposers. And that this will be the utmost close of that dispensation wherein now he walketh, I no way doubt.—The assertion being cleared and proved, the reasons of it come next to be considered: 1. The first is, that it shall be done by the way of recompence and vengeance; Ps. ii. 4, 5; Ps. cxxxvii. 8, 9; Isa. xlvii. 1-3; Isa. xlv. 26; Jer. l. 33, 34; li. 24, 25, 34, 35; Zec. xii. 2-4; xiv. 12; Rev. xviii. 6, &c. 2. That by his own wisdom he may frame such a power as may best conduce to the carrying on of his own kingdom among the sons of men; Ps. ii. 9-12; Rev. xvii. 14; Mat. xviii. 20; 1 Cor. x. 26; Eph. iv. 11-13; 1 Tim. vi. 13, 14; Ps. xlv. 6; Is. xlv. 7, 23. He hath promised his church that he will give unto it holy priests and Levites, Isa. lxi. 90, 21, which shall serve at the great feast of tabernacles, Zec. xiv. 16—a sufficient demonstration that he will dwell still in his churches by his ordinances, whatsoever some conceive: so also, that he will make her civil officers peace, and her exactors righteousness, Is. lx. 17, 18. They shall be so established that the nations, as nations, may serve it; and the kingdoms of the world shall become which unlocks many doors, and the grand and stately drama of the Apocalypse has been played out perchance in one age to be repeated in the next. Its majestic and mysterious teachings indicate the features of a struggle which, be the stage the human soul, with its fluctuations of doubt and fear, of hope and love, the progress of kingdoms, or the destinies of the world, is the same struggle in all. We may approach this book, therefore, with feelings of the profoundest awe. Its full and unfathomed depths we cannot hope to explore; their complete investigation may belong to that era when we shall know as we are known; but there are meanings we can understand, there are warnings we can profit by. There are tendencies and influences, subtle and plausible, which may lead the soul into bondage; against these we may be guarded. There are principles clear, simple, godlike: by these we may be guided, and these will be victorious at the last.

the kingdom of our Lord, Rev. xi. 15. For the present, the government of the nations (as many of them as are concerned therein) is purely framed for the interest of antichrist. No kind of government in Europe, or line of governors, so ancient, but that the beast is as old as they, and had a great influence into their constitution or establishment, to provide that it might be for his own interest. This is a second reason why the Lord Jesus, by his mighty power, at the bringing in of his immovable kingdom, will shake the heavens and the earth of the nations; even because, in their present constitution, they are directly framed to the interest of antichrist, which, by notable advantages at their first moulding, and continued insinuations ever since, hath so rivetted itself into the very fundamentals of them, that no digging or mining, without an earthquake, will cast up the foundation-stones thereof. The Lord Jesus, then, having promised the service of the nations to his church, will so far open their whole frame to the roots, as to pluck out all the cursed seeds of the mystery of iniquity, which, by the craft of Satan, and exigencies of state, or methods of advancing the pride and power of some sons of blood, have been sown among them. Add hereunto, that in this mighty work the Lord Jesus Christ will make use of the power of the nations, the horns of them, that is, their strength; Rev. xvii. 16, they must hate the whore and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh and burn her with fire. Now, whether this can be accomplished or no in their present posture is easily discernible. Doth not the papal interest lie at the bottom of all or the most ruling lines of Christendom? Can that be ejected without unbottoming their own dominion? Do they not use the efficacy of the Roman jurisdiction to balance the powers of their adversaries abroad, and to awe their subjects at home? Hath not the pope a considerable strength in every one of their own bosoms? Are not the locusts of their religious orders all sworn slaves to him, for number sufficient to make an army to fight the greatest emperor in the world? Are not most potentates tied by oath, or other compact, to maintain either the whole, or some part of the whole, tower, under the name of rights of holy church, prelates, and the like? And can any expect that such as these should take up the despised quarrel of the saints against that flourishing queen? Doubtless, no such fruit will grow on these trees before they are thoroughly shaken.

There is a probation for systems as well as persons. If they do not accomplish the good for which they are responsible, then they are thrown aside, full trial having been made of them. The monarchies and monarchs of Europe have been on such a trial for centuries. They have had incalculable spheres and opportunities of good. They might have enlightened their subjects, given them the Bible, instructed them in religion, led them to God. Instead of that, they have proved supremely selfish, and in most cases despotic. They have ruled, not for the good of the nations, but for their own pleasure. God's kingdom has not been advanced by them, nor sought; but their own—their own families and parties. The few have not ruled for the many, but have used and ruled the many for themselves. The happiness, the peace, the interests in every way, of whole nations, have been sacrificed to the personal ambition and luxury of individuals and families. It looks now as though God were bringing this experiment to its end. He seems about closing up this book of the demonstration of human depravity. The next experiment may be, whether the people will use their opportunities, and the time of their power, any less selfishly—any more for the good of mankind and the glory of God. Perhaps now God will let this experiment be tried. Almost every other has been tried. The world has endeavoured to live without God, and cannot do it. Empires have tried it, and ruin after ruin has tumbled to the ground. False religions and corruptions of Christianity have been tried, and they and the world have rotted on together. Now, if the French people, or any other people, imagine that a favourite or untried form of government or socialism is to make them, without a radical change of character by the influences of the Gospel, good and happy, they are sadly mistaken. The people will speedily discover that government was never instituted to stand in the place of personal religion, industry, and virtue; and that if they leave it to government, and throw it upon government, to do all for them, for that very reason government will be able to do nothing. Government must be supported by popular virtues, but otherwise cannot produce them. The object of government is not to give or prescribe religion to a people, but to protect them in becoming and being religious, in God's way.—Rev. Dr. Cheevers.

Even in our own country the hope is entertained by a very numerous class, that by the march of intellect, the diffusion of knowledge, and the improvement which all our institutions are soon expected to undergo, an era of virtue and happiness, unparalleled in the history of the world, is speedily approaching. But if efforts for such an end were to be successful, how small a contribution would it bring to the sum of human happiness! God would be as unknown to men as ever—Christ would be equally disesteemed—the soul would remain in the miserable darkness and in the degrading bondage of its natural condition—ambition, avarice, envy, lust, every passion would continue, and prevent them from profiting by what would otherwise have ministered to their improvement and happiness. No: separated from knowledge and faith in the truths of religion, things that are in themselves blessings may become a curse; add to which, the miseries flowing from events over which man has no control, and which, with all the foresight and sagacity of which this boasted knowledge may be productive, he never, never can avert. Disappointment would still attend his pursuits, and dissatisfaction be felt by him even when successful. Still disease and death would seize upon himself, upon his relatives and friends—upon all. No merely human knowledge can avert these events, whilst it leaves us destitute of that faith which would have yielded support under them. So that, between the absence of religion and the presence of natural evils, he is as vain and miserable as before. Even if believing that God will overrule this desire of knowledge and spirit of improvement for his own glory and the good of his people, we ought not to anticipate the perfection and continuance of human happiness in a present state. Not until the former things have passed away, and been succeeded by a new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness, shall the purpose of God and the destiny of man be completed. Then the glorious manifestation of the sons of God shall take place, in expectation of which the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now. And in the mean time, seeing that we look for such things, let us be diligent that we may be found of God in peace, without spot and blameless; and account that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation, 2 Pet. iii. 13-15.

We conclude in the words of the author to whom, in this revision of the original comment on the book of Revelation, we are so greatly indebted. "Our Christian poet's exquisite language," says Mr. Elliott, "does by no means adequately express the probable severity of the coming crisis:

"The groans of Nature in this nether world,
Which heaven has heard for ages, have an end.
Foretold by prophets, and by poets sung,
The time of rest, the promised sabbath comes.
Six thousand years of sorrow have well nigh Fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course
Over a sinful world; and what remains Of this tempestuous state of human things,
Is merely as the working of a sea
Before a calm, that rocks itself to rest."—

' Ere the sabbatism of the saints begins, something much more is to be looked for than the mere gusty closing blasts of a long tempest, or billowy heavings of the sea before a calm, as it works itself to rest. The final conflict between Christ's true church and antichrist, and their respective chiefs and supporters, both visible and invisible, is set forth in prophecy as most severe. It is individually that the application of the subject is most important; and when thus personally applied, need I say how unspeakably deep and solemn its interest! It is not enough that we belong to the most orthodox church, profess the most scriptural faith, and be even zealous for it against the many errors and heresies of the day. The question is, Are we of Christ's true disciples, his "little flock," to which alone the Father has given promise of the kingdom? Have we then the evidence of belonging to it? Have we received the apocalyptically-noted mark and seal of God's holy Spirit; and the inward light, life, and spirit of holiness and adoption, which he alone can give? Is our faith fixed on Christ as the sun of righteousness? Do we hold to the written word in life, as well as in doctrine? Do we witness for Christ in an apostate world; as in the world, but not of the world? Do we seek to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, in holiness, spiritual-mindedness, benevolence, self-denial, and patient perseverance in well-doing, through evil report as well as good report? Do we seek to improve our several talents for him, as those that must soon give account? Does our charity abound to Christ's flock and people? Is the lamp of faith trimmed, and its light kept burning within us, as by men that watch for their Lord? Is the thought of his coming precious to us? Do we look for, and love the thought of, his appearing? Doubtless there are many who can answer these questions in the affirmative; and happy are they. But there are many more, it is to be feared, with whom misgivings will arise in the conscience, as they reflect upon them. Alas! who can doubt the prevalence, in what has been not inaptly called "the religious world," of much of false profession; much of the Laodicean spirit of lukewarmness, self-conceit, religious pride, earthly-mindedness; much of the characteristic deadness of the church of Sardis, "having a name to live, but being dead?" With all such, what cause is there, in contemplation of the coming future, for humiliation, holy fear, repentance! Blessed be God, though the acceptable time remaining be short, it is not ended. Though the Master seems to be on the point of rising, he has not as yet actually risen, and shut to the door. Not only is the probationary period of permitted evil as well as good prolonged, as it is written, "He that is unjust let him be unjust still, and he that is holy let him be holy still," but the voice of mercy and love is also yet to be heard, inviting sinners to salvation: "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come; and let him that is athirst come; and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely."] thought that this expression had already become a familiar designation of the Sunday, but it seems more probable, as Trench remarks, that its use began with this passage. For a refutation of the notion that the Lord's day is equivalent to the last or judgment-day, see Notes in Alford's "Greek Testament."

i. 11. The words "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last, and" are omitted in all the old MSS.; they have probably been inserted from verses 8 and 17. "What thou seest, write in a book:" this must be understood as applying not to the epistles to the seven churches only, as Hengstenberg maintains, but to the whole of the Apocalypse.

ii. 10. "Crown of life:" "Is this crown the diadem of royalty, or the garland of victory? I believe the former" (Trench).

ii. 11. "Second death:" here, too, the promise corresponds with the character of fidelity. The faithfulness unto death is rewarded by a victory over death, even the second death.

ii. 13. "Satan's seat;" or, rather, "throne." We have no sufficient information to explain why this city should be described as thus pre-eminently bad. Some have supposed a reference to the lying wonders said to be performed at the Temple of Æsculapius, but this is hardly sufficient to explain so strong an expression as Satan's throne. "Antipas:" of the person here mentioned we know absolutely nothing. The later Latin martyrologies give an account of his death, but these are not dependable. Hengstenberg suggests that the name is symbolic, and signifies one who for Christ's sake has dared to stand out "against all." This is too fanciful to be satisfactory.

ii. 17. "White stone:" Trench inclines to see an allusion here to the Urim which the high-priest wore (Exod. xxviii. 15-30; Lev. viii. 8), and which he conjectures may have been some precious stone, probably the diamond.

iv. 4. "Four and twenty seats:" rather, "thrones," for the same word is used as in verse 2.

iv. 8. Alford places a full stop after "wings," and then reads, "around and within they are full of eyes." "Holy, holy, holy:" this word is used eight times in the Sinaitic MS., nine times in the later Vatican MS., and three times, as here, in the Alexandrine and many other MSS.
